Slattery, Democratic incumbent, successfully defended his House seat from Republican challenger Jim Van Slyke. With 77 percent of the precincts reporting, Slattery won with 58 percent to Van Slyke's 42 percent.

O'Dell called Dole when the outcome became evident about an hour after the polls closed.

"She congratulated me. I appreciated that," Dole said in a telephone interview from the Senate minority leader's office in Washington, D.C.

He said O'Dell, who billed her underdog campaign against one of the nation's most powerful politicians as "Gloria versus Goliath," had run "about as good a race as she could."

"I think she worked hard," Dole said. "Obviously, it's tough to win against an incumbent."

The senator said none of O'Dell's campaign attacks on his record and long tenure in Congress rankled him particularly, but said "some statements were made about me not owning property in Kansas and having ties to the Dole pineapple company that I think came from other people, and they weren't true."

"The fact that I've been here that long, that's fair game," Dole said of his 32 years in Washington.

He said he was pleased the race had been run on a fairly high level. "I don't think we hurt her too much. We didn't run any negative advertising. But we probably spent more than we needed to."

For her part, O'Dell said, "Goliath is (not) all that is bigger than us — it's the status quo itself. Power should not go unexamined and unquestioned."

She said when she called Dole, she told him she'd "be happy to help any time in Washington, and he said, 'The way it looks, maybe you'll be working in the Clinton administration.' I said I'd be real happy to do that."

On why Dole beat her, O'Dell said, "He's carried the name of Kansas for years on the national scene. I think there are people looking for this to be his last term as senator who wanted to give him that chance again."

GOP gains not enough to rule House

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Republicans headed for gains in the House despite Democrat Bill Clinton's victory Tuesday, and voters sent record numbers of blacks and women to Washington.

The GOP won or was leading in 28 seats previously held by Democrats, while Democrats were wrestling 14 seats away from the minority party. Redistricting appeared likely to cost Democrats two other seats.

But the changes were far short of the number needed for Republicans to take control of the House, which has been in Democratic hands since 1954.

Five Southern states sent their first black representatives to Washington since the 1800s, and record numbers of women were elected in what was shaping up as the most radically changed House since 1932, when 165 seats changed hands.

Women won or were leading in 45 races, up from their current strength in the House of 28. Blacks had won or were ahead in 38 districts, up from the current number of 25.

Against a backdrop of institutional scandals and record retirements, dozens of sitting House members were in the closest races of their careers.

House Speaker Thomas Foley, D-Wash., said the turnover was about what was expected, and predicted the new 103rd Congress will cooperate closely with the new Clinton administration.

"You're going to see quite a strong consensus develop" on issues like health care, family and medical leave, campaign finance reform and abortion rights, Foley predicted.

Incumbent House members were defeated across the political map, but the numbers fell short of predictions that a wave of anti-Washington feeling would dominate the voting.

In Texas, Republican television executive Henry Bonilla shocked incumbent Democrat Albert Bustamante, whom he had attacked for writing 30 "cheques calientes" — Spanish for "hot checks" — at the infamous House bank.

Voters in northwest Missouri rejected Republican Rep. Tom Coleman, who had a narrow escape two years ago and was accused of ignoring the homefolks. He was ousted by Democratic state Sen. Pat Danner, who will help swell the number of women in the House.

In South Carolina, Republican attorney Bob Inglis surprised Democratic incumbent Liz Patterson and Minnesota Democrat Gerry Sikorski was soundly beaten by Republican Rod Grams, a former TV anchorman and abortion opponent.

Ohio Democrat Mary Rose Oakar, labeled as one of the worst abusers in the House bad-check scandal, was downed by lawyer Martin Hoke in a district that was redrawn to include more Republicans. Another "worst abuser," Massachusetts Democrat Joseph Early, was defeated by GOP state Rep. Peter Blute.

Democrats lost races in Maryland and Louisiana, where their incumbents were pitted against incumbent Republicans because of redistricting. Wayne Gilchrest defeated Tom McMillen in Maryland, and Jim McCreery outpolled Jerry Huckaby in Louisiana.

Alabama, Florida, Virginia and North Carolina and South Carolina, with their political maps redrawn to meet requirements of the Voting Rights Act, elected their first black House members this century.

COUNTY CLERK

Raborn loses election despite student support

MEGAN MULLIKIN

Craig Raborn said he was patient. He had to be to wait for the results of the Riley County Clerk election, which were finally tabulated at 2 a.m.

Raborn, a former K-State student, lost the election by a close margin to his opponent Ilene Colbert 11,962 votes to 8,333 votes.

The first results tabulated were Raborn with 977 votes and Colbert with 1090. The results were close most of the night and into the morning.

Raborn said he felt very optimistic throughout all of the evening, because the last precincts to be calculated were the precincts closest to campus with mostly student voters.

"The K-State student support has been overwhelming," he said.

Rachel Smith, junior in English, said she voted for Raborn because he emphasized students, and he understood the registering process.

"Raborn is much more sympathetic to the needs of the students at K-State. He also thinks registering to vote isn't a complicated, difficult process," Smith said.

Raborn spent some of his day campaigning on campus and preparing for the stressful evening ahead, he said.

"In one way, I'm relieved the campaign is over. And on the other hand, I wish I had a couple more weeks to campaign, because my energy had really picked up," he said. "I've really done everything I could campaigning in the given time."

For some voters, Raborn changed the election of county clerk from an election of popularity to an election of issues, he said.

"Typically, the county clerk is not a legislative type position, it's an administrative position — people just don't discuss the issues," Raborn said. "I did everything I could to make this an issues campaign."

Even with Raborn's reports of Colbert's errors in calculating the 27 unaccounted-for absentee votes, he still failed to succeed as county clerk.

Overall the student feedback has been great, Raborn said, and being a Democrat in a mostly Republican community has become much easier for him in this election.

"There's been a great voter turnout. We've reversed a trend from low voter turnout to high," he said.

"I noticed a few weeks ago when Bill Clinton was doing so good that I could stand at a Democratic table in the (K-State) Union and say I am a Democrat and get positive feedback," Raborn said. "This is a Republican community, and the Democrats have not enjoyed a lot of success in the past. There's been exceptions to that rule, but now there's going to be a change."

Polls nationwide were closing as local Republican candidates' friends, families and supporters gathered at the Riley County Republican Headquarters to celebrate.

About 40 people, including some Republican candidates, were present.

The crowd was somber before any results were made available, but comments on the election were positive.

Mark Hatesohl, Riley County Republican Party chairman, said he felt good about the Republican candidates' chances, including President Bush.

"I'm not convinced Bush is down as far as everyone thought. The economy is not as bad as most people have said," he said.

As Hatesohl stood watching Gov. Clinton speak, before the polls around the nation were closed, he commented on Clinton's words.

"He's already promising everybody everything, and he's not even in office yet."

Rep. Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan, waited for the results of the election at the headquarters with friends and family.

Glasscock said he thought he gave Kansans the kind of campaign they expected.

"The campaign was clean, fair and focused on the issues. We focused on clarifying stances on issues. We did no mudslinging," he said.

Glasscock also complimented his opponent, Democrat Joe Swanson, for the professionalism of his campaign.

Third County Commission candidate Republican Bob Pudden said he thinks everyone should offer themselves to the community, and running for office is how he is doing it.

"I didn't have a campaign team. I had a lot of help from friends and neighbors and not a lot of help from my party. I enjoyed running for office, and if I don't win, I won't be unhappy," Pudden said.

As winners were projected, some of the candidates were asked to speak.

Glasscock was the first to talk to the crowd.

He thanked the crowd and his family for their support.

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, walked through the front doors as Glasscock mentioned her decisive victory, and the crowd cheered for the first time that evening.

Oleen joined Glasscock at the microphone, and Glasscock thanked his campaign team and the

THE FINAL HOURS

Preparing a speech to be given at a thank you party, Michelle Smith, sophomore in political science, works in her apartment, while her husband, Mike, reads a paper. Below: Michelle Smith waits for election results Tuesday evening at Democratic headquarters in Manhattan.

Smith has busy Election Day

Although Michelle Smith may not have won a seat in the Kansas Senate, many people in her campaign say she is a force with which to be reckoned.

Smith, sophomore in political science and pre-law, lost to incumbent Republican Lana Olen 11,081 votes to 4,734 votes.

"I hope that someone will take notice that our age group is a viable part of politics," said Richard Baier, junior in economics and political science.

Smith spoke to the Democratic Party Tuesday night at the Days Inn in Junction City, trying to keep morale high.

"We appreciate all the hard work from all of you, and I appreciate the time spent on my campaign," Smith said. "The numbers look good, because we put Bill Clinton in the White House."

Michelle spent most of Election Day trying to stay busy. She started the morning in class, learning about terrorists.

"What a great way to start off the morning," Smith said.

After class, she helped set up a Democratic table at the K-State Union.

Her afternoon was spent at the Democratic Headquarters, conducting interviews and driving between Junction City and Manhattan in her '86 Chevy Cavalier clad with political bumper stickers.

Friends surrounded Smith at campaign headquarters seeing what they could do to help out.

"Now I'm nervous," said Ray Kowalczewski, senior in economics, political science and pre-law and Smith's strategist, as he watched the television set up at headquarters.

At 3 p.m., there was some encouraging news.

"I heard we're doing very well," Smith said. "I don't know what that means. It could mean that we're ahead, or it could mean that we are keeping up."

At 4:30 p.m., en route to Junction City, the campaigning started taking a toll on her.

"I'm almost too tired to be excited, but too nervous not to be excited," Smith said.

Once she arrived at the Geary County headquarters, she spoke with volunteers.

"Those are the people you have to keep up the political cover with," Smith said about election volunteers. "The hardest thing is to let people like that down."

As for the future, Smith said she intends to pursue political office, but for now, she will spend spare time on other projects.

"I'm going to start getting involved in the adult literacy program," Smith said.

Watching the presidential returns, Michelle is comforted by Mike Smith while she waits to hear the results of her race against Senator Lana Olen.

Voters cite need for change as reason for final decisions

Many voters showed up at the polls yesterday, and workers at Manhattan's precincts had plenty to do.

At five of Manhattan's 29 polling sites, the polling judges were enthusiastic about the number of registered voters who were following through to vote.

The Manhattan Public Library, Ward 1, showed 562 registered voters, and at 3 p.m., 311 had voted.

"We had people having to wait because there weren't enough booths," supervising judge Richard Bachamp said. "And we've doubled our booths from the last election."

Bachamp said registration in his district was up this year by more than 200 people.

Curtis Harris Jr., 25, voted for the Clinton ticket at the library.

"We just need to get Bush out of there," he said. "Clinton can change things, and Bush has done nothing positive in four years."

At Woodrow Wilson School, the turnout was similar in strength. Out of 503 registered, 309 had voted by 3:45 p.m., with 20 absentee ballots.

One couple differed on their choice of candidates, but agreed that no matter who was in office, there would not be much change over the next four years.

"I voted for Perot because he is a businessman more than a politician," 32-year-old Ricky Widdell said. "Politics has been set in a certain range for the last 25 years or more, and Perot is a different choice."

Laura Widdell, 25, cast her vote for Bush.

"I just didn't agree with the other candidates," she said. "Bush can do a good job, but it will take longer than four years."

The line at the UFM building was out the door and all the way to the sidewalk.

"It's been that way all day," judge Loyd Guest said. "We usually get between 200 and 250 people," judge Robert Burk said.

Burk and Guest said that out of 1,194 registered, 690 had voted by 4:15 p.m.

"We have had the biggest increase in registered voters of any district in Manhattan," Burk said. "They gave us 800 ballots, then decided that wasn't enough and upped it to 1200."

Yet, another disenchanted voter cast his ballot for Perot at UFM.

"I'm tired of Bush, and I don't believe in Clinton," said Dennis Fenoughty, sophomore in animal science and industry. "I voted for Perot, because it's time for a change."

At the K-State Alumni Association building, things were moving along at a fast clip. A steady stream of voters were in and out.

"Bill Graves (secretary of state) was here earlier, and the Sigma Nus have really been hitting us," judge Jo Call said.

Call said the age group varied, but she had noticed a lot of students.

Talisha Byers, junior in elementary education, was one of them.

"I voted for Clinton," she said. "I'm tired of hearing 'Read my lips.' We need to hear a new song."

Ronald Dumas, sophomore in information systems, said he voted for Perot because he is a businessman.

"The whole world economy is one big business," he said. "Besides, I've been through Arkansas, and it's not too great, so I don't think Clinton can do much."

At the Manhattan Jewish Congregation poll site, a steady flow of business people had been hurrying in and out, supervising judge Nancy Nelson said.

"We had a line clear to the parking lot first thing this morning," she said. "They wouldn't shut the door."

Students voting on campus were as divided as the rest of the nation. No one candidate stood out among students voting in Derby Food Center.

"I'm kind of sick of the traditional politics and the traditional system," said Mike Wolford, graduate student in English.

Economics and domestic affairs are a propellant for Clinton voters here as well as across the country.

"I voted for Clinton mainly because four years ago I was a hell of a lot better off than I am now," said Wendy Walters, junior in psychology and pre-med.

"With Bush, me and my husband both lost our jobs. I'm very much voting against Bush, but I am also very much voting for Clinton," Walters said.

Many people crossed party lines to help support Clinton's domestic agenda.

"I think the country needs a change, and I don't think a lot has been accomplished in the last four years. I'm a Republican, and I'm voting for a Democrat. I think it's time for a change," said Kristi Bradley, a Running game returns to Wildcat offense

Offensive line sparks Cat backfield to 160 yards in loss

STEVE ROCK

Collegian

In the Wildcats' two Big Eight losses before Saturday's contest against the Oklahoma Sooners, the K-State running game was limited to a combined total of minus-80 yards.

Against the Sooners, the ground game returned to the Wildcat offense.

Sparked by what K-State center Quentin Neujahr called the best performance of the offensive line this year, Wildcat runners gained a total of 160 yards.

"Anytime you run over 100 yards against Oklahoma," Neujahr said, "it's a feat in itself."

Indeed, a year ago against OU, the Wildcats gained 40 rushing yards on 33 attempts.

The Wildcats had been posting numbers similar to last year's Oklahoma game this season before Saturday's 16-14 loss.

After gaining 551 total yards on the ground through the first three games of the season, all victories, the Cats had a total of minus-16 yards in their next three games, all losses.

Saturday's resurgence, offensive tackle Mike Orr said, was the result of the offensive line's hard work in practice and knowledge that the Wildcat offense was going to revolve around the run.

"We put a lot of emphasis on the running game and took some pressure off of the passing game," he said. "We just got back to the basics."

And, he said, it paid off.

"The offensive line finally started getting it together, and now we're playing like we're capable of playing," he said.

"We went four weeks and didn't have any kind of an offense at all. We've been ridiculed a lot over the year, which we deserved — we haven't played good."

And Saturday's game, he said, gave the offensive line something to build on.

"We didn't play great, by any means. But we improved a lot. We had to start with a base, and that was a good one to start with."

Neujahr, a second-team all-Big Eight selection a year ago, said the offensive line is now starting to play to its potential.

"The running game has always been there," he said. "It just hasn't gelled. Things just hadn't clicked, and I think they clicked Saturday."

The primary recipient of that click was quarterback Jason Smargiasso. He led the team with 52 yards rushing.

But running backs Eric Gallon and J.J. Smith also had good games.

Gallon, who was held to seven rushing yards against Colorado and minus-nine against Kansas, had 49 against the Sooners.

Smith had 46 yards on 10 carries.

The Wildcats, who threw just 10 passes, relied on the running game to keep them in the contest.

"We damn near threw it only one time," Cat coach Bill Snyder said. "The first one, we completed the wrong way."

Indeed, Smargiasso's first pass of the game was intercepted and returned to the K-State six-yard line. The Wildcats threw just once more in the first half.

"I thought we played with greater intensity up front," Snyder said. "We got off the line of scrimmage a little bit better."

Indeed, Neujahr said that, even though the line can do better, this was its best game of the season.

Will the Oklahoma game spark the offensive line to bigger and better things?

"I think so," he said. "I hope so."

VOLLEYBALL

Setter Dau dressed for success

Freshman spiker adopts college level well, breaks records

SCOTT ABEL

Collegian

Like many freshmen, Chi Dau didn't know what to expect at college.

"It was just a big deal for me to go to college and play volleyball, and to go on scholarship," the setter said. "I didn't really know what it would be like."

And on the final lap of K-State's volleyball season, her team has gotten to know what to expect out of Dau.

"She's become very much one of the mainstays of our team," head coach Patti Hagemeyer said. "She doesn't ever quit, and she always gives the team 110 percent."

With her 35 assists against UMKC Saturday night, Dau has tallied 928 this season. That moved her into fifth place on the K-State single-season assist chart.

In her seventh match as a Wildcat, Dau had 74 assists in a September win at DePaul, which broke the school record for a four-game match.

But despite her record-breaking performances, Dau said that she didn't think about them very much.

"I didn't know about the whole college volleyball scene, and I didn't know that 35 assists was good. I just did it. Then Patti told me I broke the record, and I was like, 'Oh, O.K.'"

"She really had no idea," Hagemeyer said. "She's pretty modest, and we had to educate her on what a good statistic is."

Dau was born in Vietnam, and her family left for the United States at the end of the war.

"We came to America in 1975," Dau said. "I was a year old. We were part of the first wave that came over, so I've been here practically my whole life."

After living in South Carolina for eight years, the Dau family moved to Houston, Texas, where Dau learned to play volleyball in middle school.

Dau played her senior year on a club team with her future K-State roommate, middle blocker Heather Zoerner.

"Patti came to a tournament we were playing in," Zoerner said, "and recruited us both to come to K-State. Chi and I were both really excited, and coming together has made it that much better."

Hagemeyer said Chi's work ethic was one thing that impressed her most.

"She just loves to work," Hagemeyer said. "She was a yearbook editor in high school, and I'd tell her I'd like to call her later, and she'd say, 'O.K., but I'll be at school until 11 that night.'"

"She doesn't take shortcuts, and her discipline has helped her."

Hagemeyer said the Wildcats normally play with a single setter on the court at one time, putting the setting pressure squarely on Dau.

But Dau said that it is a role with which she is most comfortable.

"I always try to be positive on the court," she said. "But I also try to push them."

"If I give them a perfect set and they don't put it away, I'll tell them. And if I don't, I expect them to tell me."

Dau is one of six standout freshmen performers on the squad, something that she said the team can build on in the future.

"We have a long way to go, but we have a lot of potential," Dau said. "It's going to be really great."

"I'm really glad it's starting with my freshman year."

GOLF

Men's team finishes 9th in 18-team field

KRISTEEN YOUNG

Collegian

K-State's men's golf team finished its season in the top half of the Texas Inter-collegiate Tournament Monday and Tuesday.

The Wildcats finished in ninth place at the 18-team tourney, improving from 12th place after the first two rounds Monday.

Southwest Missouri State was the first-place team, and K-State coach Mark Elliott attributed the Bears' victory to their consistent play throughout the three-round competition.

The Cats finished 38 strokes behind the tournament winner.

"We didn't play well. Southwest Missouri won it and played well in all three rounds," Elliott said.

Prior to the tournament, Elliott stressed the need to place higher than the Bears — a team in the same region.

One advantage Southwest Missouri had in the final round was that the Bears competed with one more golfer.

Although five golfers competed for each school, only the top four scores are added in the team's total. On Tuesday, sophomore Wildcat Brett Waldman sat out of competition. Elliott cited attitude problems.

"Brett sat out for disciplinary reasons, so we had to use all four of our scores from the people who played today," Elliott said.

In the individual standings, Sean Robertson finished in 13th place, highest among K-Staters. Jason Losch finished in 19th place, Richard Laing in 42nd and Will Siebert in 61st.

Laing, competing in his final collegiate year, was ranked as a preseason all-American by Golf Week magazine. Although he hasn't won a tournament during the fall season, Elliott looks for him to do well in the spring.

"I saw some good things from Rich, and I think he'll be ready for the spring. He just has to get back to the things that made him a preseason all-American choice," Elliott said.

The Wildcats saw some of their highest scores and placings in school history as they placed second at KU's tourney and first at Iowa State's this season.

"This was a great fall season for us, especially for when the NCAA Regions are chosen," he said.

Earlier in the week, the Wildcats were ranked sixth in the region in a poll that was released earlier in the week by Golf Week magazine.

"Now we will lift and run over the winter, and the players will play on their own," Elliott said.

► SPIKERS LOSE IN 3

The K-State volleyball team lost a road game to Wichita State Tuesday night.

Wichita State, now 23-4, won the match in three sets, defeating the Wildcats 15-10, 15-4 and 15-8.

Kathy Saxton had 32 attacks and now holds the K-State single-season record for attacks in one year. She has 1,082 — breaking a seven-year-old Wildcat record.

► PLAYERS OF THE WEEK

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — Halfback James McMillon of Iowa State and defensive tackle John Parrella of Nebraska were named players of the week Monday in the Big Eight Conference.

McMillon, who will face K-State Thursday, set a Cyclone record with 118 yards in two punt returns last week. One return went for 78 yards and a touchdown.

► KARROS WINS NL ROOKIE OF THE YEAR AWARD

NEW YORK — Eric Karros, who nearly played his way out of the Los Angeles Dodgers organization, was selected the National League Rookie of the Year.

The husky Los Angeles first baseman was chosen first on 22 of the 24 ballots and received 116 points overall from the Baseball Writers Association of America. Montreal outfielder Moises Alou was the runner-up, followed by Pittsburgh knuckleballer Tim Wakefield with two first-place votes.

Karros hit .257 with 20 homers and 88 RBIs. His RBI total surpassed Ron Cey's Los Angeles rookie record of 80 set in 1973.

Karros also led all rookies this season. Alou, the son of Montreal manager Felipe Alou, hit .282 with nine homers and 56 RBIs. Wakefield was 8-1 with a 2.15 ERA.

Still no women in combat, panel says

But presidential commission backs service on warships

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Women in the military should be allowed to serve on some warships, a presidential commission recommended Tuesday. But women should be barred from both ground fighting and combat missions in Air Force and Navy aircraft, the commission said.

The 15-member commission on the assignment of women in the armed forces strongly supported retaining the ban on land combat but defied expectations in its 8-7 vote to keep the current policy on air missions.

The panel voted 8-6 with one abstention to repeal existing laws and modify service policies on women serving on combatant vessels. They recommended retaining the current ban on women aboard submarines and amphibious vessels but allowing them to serve for the first time on fighting ships that seek out the enemy, like destroyers, frigates and aircraft carriers.

That vote came after an appeal from the commission's chairman, retired Gen. Robert Herres, that the panel not totally accept the status quo.

"A great number of people will not believe we credibly considered these issues" without some concession to changing times, the former vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff told the President Bush-appointed group.

The votes on air and sea combat came in the afternoon, following the return of four members who walked out of the morning session to stress their view that there should be no expanded role for women in the military. A fifth man with similar views boycotted the morning meeting.

The recommendation said the Air Force and Navy should retain and codify their prohibition of women on air combat missions in view of the potential consequences of assigning women to combat positions.

The proposal was made by Air Force Reserve Sgt. Sarah F. White, who deplored that there "are women willing to kill or be killed to promote equal opportunity."

Other opponents spoke of dangers to the national security if women pilots are captured and the possible negative effects of women on the cohesion of fighter pilot units.

The panel earlier voted 8-2 that women should be excluded from direct land combat units. However, it added that service secretaries should recommend to Congress what units and positions should fall under land combat exclusion.

The role of women in the military has been a prominent issue since the Persian Gulf War, when 35,000 women served — some in non-combat air and sea units.

MEDICINE

Dogs may benefit from Parkinson's drug

Treatment for humans now in trial stages for dogs; may curb canine aging process

LIANA RIESINGER

Collegian

A drug used for treating Parkinson's Disease in human patients may now be effective in treating dogs for two different diseases.

The drug, Deprenyl, has been approved by the Food & Drug Administration for human treatment for the last three years but is in the trial stage for dogs. The K-State School of Veterinary Medicine is performing preliminary trials with the drug.

"The same mechanism from Deprenyl that prevents Parkinson's may help the aging process in dogs," said David Bruyette, assistant professor of veterinary medicine.

The two canine diseases that Deprenyl may help are cognitive dysfunction, which is similar to senility in humans, and Cushing's disease, which affects the dog's pituitary gland creating an excess amount of hormones.

The aging (senility) of dogs is what brings on the cognitive malfunctions, Bruyette said.

"Senility impairs cognitive function whether in memory, or in ability to relate to the environment," he said. "Cognitive dysfunction in dogs impairs their normal thinking resulting in loss of bladder control, inattentiveness, and disobedience."

The excess hormones created from Cushing's cause the adrenal glands to grow too large, therefore the dog gains weight, loses its hair and may even get diabetes, Bruyette said.

"We've had very encouraging results with both diseases," he said. "We're hoping for FDA approval and to put the drug on the market within a year for either cognitive impairment or Cushing's."

The connection between Parkinson's and cognitive dysfunction and Cushing's was discovered by Jozsef Knoll, department of pharmacology chairman at Semmelweis University of Medicine in Budapest, Hungary.

Knoll found that as rats age, their cognitive performances deteriorate. He gave older rats Deprenyl, and they began functioning as well as younger rats.

William Ruehl, director of scientific affairs at Deprenyl Animal Health, Inc. in Kansas City, said Deprenyl has a number of effects on the brain and the central nervous system.

"Some of the effects influence

Senior wins trip to New York City, all expenses paid

Interior design is more than picking out drapes, said Diane Pratt, senior in interior design.

Pratt won the "Discover Hospitality in the 21st Century" competition with a project she designed.

She will receive an all-expense paid trip to New York City Nov. 7 for the International Hotel/Motel and Restaurant Show. She will meet there with her project that took first place this year in the lodging category.

The project was a design of a 6-foot-wide hotel room, equipped with the essentials needed for an overnight stay, with limited extras to help keep the cost down. The class was given a problem statement regarding hotel lodging and had two weeks to complete it.

"I think the creator will always see their work with more humbling eyes," Pratt said. "But I do think it had some exciting ideas."

Pratt said her expectations were not very high. She said this was only the third contest she has entered.

"I hope to have the opportunity to speak about my ideas at the display," Pratt said. She will be seated at the head table, where her project will be displayed.

There will be 1,500 participants at the show, and more than 60,000 are expected to attend.

"I'm hoping to take advantage of this opportunity to meet people that will lead to employment, which is my ultimate goal," Pratt said.

Pratt's project will also be featured in an upcoming issue of Hospitality Design magazine.

"The quality of our program should be noted," Pratt said. "Not only instructors, but students spend a lot of time bouncing ideas off of each other. It would be misleading for me to take all of the credit."

This is the first time a K-State student has won this award.

Dairy Science to receive $50,000 gift

SHEDERA BAUSCH

Collegian

The Department of Animal Science and Industry has received a $50,000 estate gift to benefit students with an interest in dairy science.

Cecil Haines, former Kansas City, Mo. resident and 1914 graduate of the K-State dairy science program, gave the department the money to try to repay the University for the success he believed it had given him.

Robert Haines, nephew of Cecil Haines and president of Sunflower Bank in Manhattan, said Cecil enjoyed the education he received at K-State.

"Cecil felt like he learned a lot while he was in school here," Haines said.

Haines said Cecil thought his success in the business world came from the education he received at K-State.

"He felt like he had an obligation to repay the program because it was part of his success," Haines said.

Robert Haines said several other Haines family members attended K-State.

"He was a sensitive individual who wanted to give something back, primarily he wanted to honor his family that attended K-State,"

Haines said.

Gordon Dowell, KSU Foundation director of publications, said the University was very pleased with Haines' gift.

"Cecil was a person who wanted to help other students benefit from what he learned," Dowell said.

"The money will be invested and the interest from it will be used for dairy science scholarships," Dowell said.

The department is not certain how many scholarships will be given, but they will be offered to students enrolled in the K-State animal science and industry program with a curriculum option in dairy, he said.

Clinton, Gore take reins time the winning presidential ticket consists of two Southerners.

"It symbolically expresses the reality that the sectional wounds of the past are irrelevant," Gore said.

He further denounced division by difference, promising to work toward getting rid of race and gender discrimination.

Gore often turned the focus to support for his running mate.

"Bill Clinton won because he was willing to lose. He refused to mislead voters," Gore said.

"Where I come from, we have a name for that — character," he said, co-opting the Republicans' repeated swipes at the Democrats' character.

Both men reflected on the focus of the future.

Gore said he thought many people there voted for them with their children in mind.

He promised they would not only help give them the best for the next four years, but something greater.

"We will have given them back their future," he said.

Clinton, saying people want "a government that's a hand-up, not a handout," stressed opportunity for all.

"You can trust us to wake up every day, remembering the people we saw on the bus trips," he said, including those who had never voted before or never voted Democrat, "all saying 'We want our future back.' And I intend to help give it to you."

The handful of Iriano's employees were truly unprepared for this craziness. They had to unhook the carbon dioxide line from the soft-drink machine and hook up another keg to keep enough beer flowing.

"This is the most amazing thing we've ever seen," said another customer, wearing a Clinton-Gore button she said she would show her grandkids someday.

"Arkansas is a small state. And for being the capital, this is a small town," she said. "I can't believe how many people came together for this."

When someone bumped the satellite hookup, and the big-screen television Iriano's brought in for the night went blank, few people noticed. They kept on partying. Few seemed to doubt their man would pull it off.

Outside, below the lights of the Excelsior Hotel where the Democratic party hobnobbed, in the middle of a crowd of thousands in front of a huge big-screen television, one man said: "This sounds like a damn pro football game. I can't believe this is happening in Little Rock."

People crowded balconies, hung out windows, climbed onto roofs and lined the levels of a nearby parking garage.

The crowd cheered as much when the big screen showed glimpses of Little Rock as they did for Clinton. The spotlight the campaign and election brought to their state will not soon be forgotten.

When the big screen flashed 285 electoral votes for Clinton as Ohio's predicted returns pushed him over the 270 needed, the cheers were deafening and faded into a 5-minute chant of "No more Bush!"

People's comments reflected as much pride in their state as in their governor.

"It makes me so happy to see him go so far, because people have such a skewed view of Arkansas," one woman said. "Well, if a governor from Arkansas can be president, maybe that will change."

And one man who called himself a Bush supporter said: "My instinct tells me he won't forget where he comes from."

The rain that made the day's preparations tedious stopped early in the evening.

And though the temperature dropped steadily, and the wind grew stronger, if the near-freezing temperatures kept anyone away from the party, it would have been tough to find anywhere to put them.

And if there were Republicans around, they were hard to spot. A few people did say they voted for Bush, but they were clearly outnumbered.

The only Bush supporters at Iriano's who were vocal enough to get noticed got kicked out early in the evening for being too obnoxious and hanging around too long.

fourth-year student in veterinary medicine.

Military safety and foreign affairs were a driving force in the Bush vote.

"I was going to vote for Perot until I got in there, and then I thought Bush would be the safer candidate," said Heather Coulter, freshman in elementary education. "Clinton would be raising taxes too high. Clinton wants to limit the military, and Fort Riley is first on the list. That's important to us in this area."

Belief in Perot's unorthodox approach to the presidential race and an attachment to the candidate's character inspired many first-time voters to rally around Perot's reform banner.

"I like his health-care program, his ability to run a business and his desire to get people off of welfare and putting this country back to work. I like the way he defied the normal political process," said Leslie Bayouth, freshman in arts and sciences.

Many voters could not pinpoint the source of Perot's appeal.

"I don't really know why I'm voting for Perot," said Julie Lill, freshman in art and graphic design.

"I find him to be more genuine. What really struck me was when he said he would refuse to be paid for being president," Lill said.

Republicans.

"As Sen. Oleen and I have said before, 'No candidate wins an election. Volunteers and organizations do,'" Glasscock said.

Oleen was next at the microphone, also thanking others for their support and hard work.

The mood at the Democratic Headquarters was one of elation early in the evening. The celebrations had already started after Clinton took an early lead.

"We already had our champagne," said Ruth Schrum, co-chairwoman for the Clinton-Gore Riley County campaign. "We went ahead of time."

"It's just that everybody is here," said Christopher Cokinos, also co-chairman with Schrum. "We're going to win and win big."

By early morning, the results were final.

Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kansas, was elected for his fifth term in the U.S. Senate, beating Democrat Gloria O'Dell.

Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan, won her uncontested seat in the Kansas House.

Some said they were pleased with the large voter turnout.

"When I went today to vote at Lee School, I drove around and around, and I couldn't find a parking spot," Schrum said. "I've voted here for years, and I've never had to wait in line."

The cheering became louder when Bush conceded the vote.

"Isn't it going to be nice to have two good looking guys in the White House?" a supporter said.

In terms of percentage, it appeared three to five percent more eligible Americans voted this year than in 1988, when an all-time low of 50.2 percent cast ballots, he said.

That would make it the best showing since 1972, when 55.4 percent of Americans voted, Gans said.

But the increase is likely just a temporary blip caused by voter anger over President Bush's handling of the economy, he cautioned.

"The biggest reason is the recession and a little bit of 'Read my lips' and a little bit (Ross) Perot. But there's nothing in the election itself to say it is anything but temporary," said Gans, founder of the Committee for the Study of the American Electorate.

Long lines wrapped around polling places almost everywhere in the nation, from Minneapolis, where voters stood in 8 inches of fresh fallen snow, to Colorado, where even Gov. Roy Romer had to wait 45 minutes to cast his ballot.

"We haven't had a stream like this in ages," said Pat DeVore, elections judge at a Teamsters' hall in Erie, Pa., where a high-profile Senate race was contributing to high turnout.

metabolism and concentration of neurotransmitters, especially dopamine," Ruehl said. "Deprenyl inhibits activity of the enzyme monoamine oxidase B, which breaks down dopamine."

Parkinson's patients have a dopamine depletion already, so Deprenyl hopes to inhibit the enzyme that breaks down even more dopamine, Ruehl said.

"Parkinson's patients' cells don't produce enough dopamine, and Deprenyl produces the amount needed for the specific area of the brain," said Charles Hedgcock, K-State professor of biochemistry.

Through an exemption from the FDA, Deprenyl Animal Health Inc. is performing preliminary trials for Cushing's disease at the K-State Small Animal Clinic, Ruehl said.

BLUE KEY

Personal goals needed for success Student Senate calls special session

K-State grad speaks during Leadership Week

DIANE DENISON
Collegian

Success can be found where there are leadership opportunities, said Ron Paradis, sportscaster for WIBW News of Topeka and K-State graduate.

Paradis spoke Tuesday morning as part of the K-State Leadership Week, sponsored by Blue Key National Honor Society.

"I found it through athletics," said Paradis, who spoke on "Taking the Athletic View: How to Prepare Yourself for Success."

Paradis said while playing basketball at K-State, he was focused on basketball and used it to avoid social contact. Such an intense interest in a sport can hurt a person. "You can overdo it," he said. "It is healthier to have other interests and expand on them."

Success is not something only received through education, he said. Paradis said many successful people became successful because they did what they wanted to do.

"Mark Twain never finished grade school," he said. "Peter Jennings never got through high school, and Lee Iacocca was fired by Ford."

When Paradis asked for questions from the audience, he was asked who his sports heroes were.

"My sports heroes were not the superheroes like George Brett, because they are too caught up in themselves," Paradis said. "As a sportscaster, I've seen their flaws."

His heroes are people who have succeeded and did it not for the money, but because it was what they truly wanted to do, he said.

In today's society, success is wrongly measured by the amount of money received from a career, he said.

"Don't let money influence anything with your career," he said. "Our society is money oriented, and it is wrong."

A person's career should not be dictated solely on a monetary basis, he said. Money is the reason there is so little loyalty in professional sports.

"The agents want their players' salaries publicized," Paradis said. "This allows them to see what others are getting so they can ask more for their players."

Group meeting for discussion on first report draft

AMY WRIGHT
Collegian

Student Senate will meet tonight to discuss a resolution to send to the provost's committee about the Roles and Aspirations Report for the Kansas Board of Regents.

Student Body President Jackie McClaskey called the special meeting for 8:30 p.m. in the Union Big 8 Room. The special meeting will not take the place of the regular meeting. Senate will not meet Thursday because of the K-State-Iowa State game being nationally televised on ESPN.

McClaskey, who has worked closely with the roles and aspirations process and the provost's committee, has asked Senate to review the first draft of the report before the meeting. She said she is looking for input she can take back to the provost's committee.

At the Oct. 29 meeting,

Roles and Aspirations Report

Students interested in learning more about the report can contact their student senator by calling the Student Governing Association at 532-6541.

McClaskey urged Senate members to talk to students to find out concerns and report those back to Senate at today's meeting.

"This is our one and only chance to give input into the [provost's] recommendation to the Board of Regents," she said. "You are the only group of students who will have the opportunity to sit down and discuss it."

A final draft of the report will be submitted to the regents by Nov. 20.

Any written comments concerning the report can be given to Dennis Kuhlman, professor of agricultural engineering and chairman of the Provost's Role and Aspirations Committee, by Nov. 13 in Seaton Hall 229.

Abortion gag rule illegal, panel says

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration may not enforce a rule restricting federally funded family planning clinics from counseling patients about abortion, a federal appeals court ruled Tuesday.

A three-judge panel of the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said the revised gag rule, permitting only doctors at the clinics to discuss abortion with patients, was adopted illegally.

The Department of Health and Human Services adopted the modified rule without giving the public adequate opportunity to challenge it, the appeals court said.

The agency changed the 1988 rule at the direction of President Bush to exempt doctors from the gag rule in what administration critics said was a fraudulent compromise motivated by politics.

Left unclear after Tuesday's ruling is whether the administration could enforce the broader gag rule, barring even doctors from discussing abortion.

"We're examining our options," said Susan Zagame, a lawyer with the Department of Health and Human Services.

She declined further comment. The gag rule would affect some 4,000 clinics that serve about 3.7 million women a year.

ESSENTIALS

Play it again, Sam — and turn up the volume this time

DEAR CASSANDRA,

This letter is in response to the respectable gentlemen whose letters were published Oct. 26. A couple of us here at K-State just want to let them know that there are still some kind and honest women on campus.

Personally, we are sick of the meat-market atmosphere one finds in the bars in Aggieville.

How long can one play the field without getting bored? How many one-night stands and weekends of meaningless "shacking" does it take to give one a pretty good idea that you are picking bad apples?

One suggestion to the gentleman who feels all girls just want to date around: there seems to be an underlying fear of commitment when people first get involved on this campus.

Both partners involved tend to deny the possibility of a relationship for reasons nobody seems to understand.

It would be a perfect world if all these sincere people could just magically find each other. Trust us, there really are women who long for candlelit dinners with an intriguing companion instead of a beer-swilling pig lacking the ability to compute simple math or carry on basic communication (without burping or grunting).

Next time you get the urge to share a moonlit dance with someone, strike up Van Morrison's "Moondance," and play it loud enough we can find you.

Signed,
Waiting for the Music

DEAR WAITING,

It is the simple things in life — genuine caring, communication, and compassion — that most people want in a relationship. I hope you hear the music soon.

DEAR CASSANDRA,

I'm writing in reference to your replies Oct. 26. I must say that in some respects, I agree with you, but in others I see it from a different point of view.

With the letter concerning a singles dance, it sounds like a good idea. Even with college being full of single individuals, it is difficult to determine whether or not the other person you "find" is single like yourself.

Married women wear rings, as well as some married men, to indicate a significant other, but in some cases it's different. Engaged men don't have a symbol, like a ring, to show that they have someone.

In female cases, like my roommate who doesn't wear any jewelry, even some women don't show their engagement. A singles dance would be a chance where actual singles can meet other actual singles.

Now, as for enjoying single life, there are the pluses like taking in a movie "solo," without the worry of disturbing your significant other by discussing and remarking on the movie while it is playing; and there is also truth in the apple theory, but that only offers a small consolation to the person's loneliness for a while.

There are times when the pluses, friends and parents can't fill the void, no matter how supportive they may be. I know this because I have gone, and am still going through this sort of thing with myself time and again, and also with others.

My parents don't help much, since they try to rule my life more than support it. As for friends, they do all they can, but the sense of longing and loneliness remains.

And as for the pain and wait part, I've had my share, but to others it may seem rather tame. All I want now is to find my piece of peace in sharing time with my significant other.

Signed,
Still Seeking

DEAR STILL SEEKING,

All you entrepreneurial types take note. This singles dance idea sounds like a booming business waiting to happen.

I have said it before, and I'll say it again, get out and get involved.

I am convinced that as long as your mind is not consciously (and continually) on the "seeking" aspect of trying to find that special person in your life, you will find yourself much more content.

Loneliness is a difficult thing, but I personally think it is something we all must learn to deal with. At some point in your life (women especially, since women tend to live longer than men), you will again find yourself without a mate.

You need to have developed ways to survive that kind of situation.

Letters to Cassandra may be submitted in person or by mail to the Kansas State Collegian, c/o Cassandra Duveaux, Kedzie Hall 106, Manhattan, KS 66506.

Cassandra reserves the right to edit the content for the purpose of conserving space. Unless otherwise specified, all letters will be open to the public. Correspondence designated as "private" or "not for publication" will be maintained in the strictest confidence.

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for. Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations. Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

Academic freedom questioned

"Legitimate explorations as judged by peers in an academic sense has a right to be expressed."

VLADIMIR KRISTIC

TONYA FOSTER
Collegian

Academic freedom was the topic of discussion at an architecture students' forum Wednesday in the Union Forum Hall.

The event that triggered the open forum involved an architecture student's project which was thought to be offensive and was removed by a staff member from the first floor walls of Seaton Hall Oct. 26.

Tim Hossler, fifth-year student in architecture and one of the forum's organizers, participated in the College of Architecture Study in Italy Program.

Hossler's project was removed before a descriptive text explaining the project could be added.

Vladimir Krstic, professor of architecture, said as a faculty member, academic freedom was his main concern.

"Legitimate explorations as judged by peers in an academic sense has a right to be expressed," he said.

Krstic said projects taken out of context have tendencies to be attacked.

"It started from our student group discussions," said Milton Rosa, fifth-year student in architecture and forum organizer.

The other organizers of the forum, David Boone and Ann Shadle, both fifth-year students in architecture, said they hope forums like this one could be a preventive step in the understanding of academic freedom.

"The strength is that we got people talking," Rosa said.

"We wanted it to be open dialogue," said Mordean Taylor-Archer, assistant provost for multicultural affairs and moderator of the forum.

"We don't want this to be formal, but a participation."

Lane Marshall, dean of the College of Architecture, said he did not find it offensive. It was a legitimate display to a legitimate problem.

"In architecture we are a family, and as a family we have certain obligations," Marshall said. "This goes further in how we treat each other."

"We need to use good common sense and to be aware of University policy," he said.

Judy Davis, director of Women's Resource Center, said the dilemma discussed is an issue in every institution of every community in the nation.

She said our society is just beginning to confront the tension of two fundamental values that are both rooted in the U.S. Constitution.

"Each of which require our individual, daily vigilance for its preservation," Davis said.

She said the first provision was the freedom to express, to speak and to create.

The second provision is protection under the law provided by the 5th and 14th Amendments.

Leland Warren, professor of English, said academic freedom is allowed to those who choose to partake in it.

"I take responsibility in what I say in class," Warren said. "I'm careful in what I say. Increase understanding, not hostility."

Hossler's project has not been returned to the walls of Seaton.

Transition '93: The New Administration

Clinton reveals his wish list

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — America, meet your new president.

Bill Clinton wants to ban assault weapons. He wants to guarantee family leave from jobs. He will push for a national examination system to measure the progress of students and schools. He wants to guarantee — by law — a woman's right to abortion.

Across a wide swath of government policy, a sea of change is coming.

Executive orders signed by George Bush and Ronald Reagan are up for review. Bills they vetoed are being resurrected.

An activist government is stirring after 12 years of Republican attempts to restrain Washington's power.

"Clinton is a young leader who has a clear message about solving some problems in society," said James Thurber, director of American University's Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies. "That alone will bring a great sense of change. This is a historic election."

The economy was issue No. 1, and the centerpiece of Clinton's campaign was a stimulus program built around a $20-billion-a-year spending plan for highways and bridges to create jobs. Longer term, he'll seek investment tax credits for new plants and equipment and a capital gains tax cut for new business.

He wants to raise taxes on Americans with household incomes over $200,000 and cut taxes for middle and lower-income workers.

Beyond Clinton's highly publicized promises on the economy and health insurance, though, are numerous other unequivocal positions that lay a blueprint for his administration.

He has pledged to sign the Brady Bill, requiring a waiting period for handgun purchases. He wants to ban offshore oil drilling where rigs are not already in place. He wants a law to prohibit companies from hiring permanent replacements for strikers.

Clinton says homosexuals should not be excluded from the military. The number of American troops in Europe would be cut from 75,000 to 100,000 under Clinton, rather than the 150,000 ceiling set by President Bush. Clinton says allies should shoulder more of the burden.

He wants to allow states to automatically register people to vote when they apply for drivers' licenses. He is willing to spend $8.25 billion for atom-smashing superconducting super collider projects. He says he'll repeal most Bush abortion policies.

To combat crime, Clinton wants to put 100,000 new police officers on the streets through a national corps and other means. He supports the death penalty.

He wants to limit carbon dioxide emissions to 1990 levels by the year 2000 to reverse global warming.

Clinton also wants to cut defense spending by about $100 billion by 1997. He intends to scrap the massive spaced-based defense system known as Brilliant Pebbles.

Perot power may pave third party

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DALLAS — Some of Ross Perot's campaign aides said Wednesday that the 19 million Americans who voted for him could form a third political party if President-elect Clinton fails to revive the economy and cut the deficit.

"The basis for a third party is there if the group wishes to pursue that as an ultimate end. I think it's worth a lot of consideration," said Orson Swindle, executive director of Perot's volunteer organization, United We Stand, America.

But experts on third parties and even some Perot associates said that the success of Clinton's presidency would determine whether United We Stand will be a potent political force. And Perot's own future role remained unclear.

The organization will remain active to promote the Texas billionaire's proposals for deficit reduction and economic revival, Swindle said.

The group might even form a political action committee to contribute to congressional candidates, aides said, even though Perot constantly denounced these committees during the campaign as the tool of special interests.

But neither Swindle nor other aides could specify how Perot would work to keep his issues before the American public or whether he would consider running again in 1996.

▶ TRICK-OR-TREATER SHOT BY MISTAKE

BATON ROUGE, La. (AP) — A grand jury indicted a man Wednesday on a manslaughter charge for the accidental shooting of a Japanese exchange student who knocked on his door dressed in a Halloween costume.

Rodney Peairs, Baton Rouge, will surrender to officials today. Peairs admitted shooting the boy he said he mistook for an intruder.

▶ 3 SAILORS KILLED ABOARD VESSEL

NORFOLK, Va. (AP) — Three Navy ship crew members died Wednesday when sheet metal panels overturned on them in a passageway, the Navy said.

The victims' names — two enlisted men and one enlisted woman — were being withheld pending notification of relatives.

The accident occurred about 2 p.m. aboard the USS Shenandoah.

SPECIAL SESSION

Senate opposes program cuts

AMY WRIGHT
Collegian

A resolution from Student Senate opposing the proposed discontinuation of speech pathology and audiology programs barely passed in a special session Wednesday night.

The resolution also "strongly encourages the president and the Provost Committee to find alternatives within the University to the proposed discontinuation of these established programs."

The roll-call vote was 22-20, with six members voting by abstention, meaning the senators were aware of their right to vote yes or no but refused to commit one way or the other.

Graduate Sen. Joel Gruenke opposed the legislation and said, "The purpose of Role and Aspirations process is not to make sure students have jobs."

Gruenke said the only way the Kansas Legislature will see there is a problem is if programs are cut. Until the effect of budget cutbacks become noticeable through program discontinuations the funding cuts will continue.

Barbara Rinker, graduate student in speech pathology, said the cuts being made in the speech pathology and audiology programs do not represent budget cuts. The budget will stay the same, she said, and will be reallocated to other areas.

Rinker said there are not sufficient programs at other Kansas schools to meet students' needs if K-State's program is cut.

Education Sen. Amy Smith said the Professor receives grant from USDA

COLLEGIAN STAFF

A K-State professor of biochemistry has been awarded a $100,000 grant from the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

Lawrence Davis, professor of biochemistry, was awarded the grant for his research of enzymes in bacteria, which could lead to the reduction of the need for ammonia fertilizer.

His interests include biological nitrogen fixation. His overall research involves improving the ability to take nitrogen gas out of the air and convert it into ammonia.

Davis, a professor at K-State since 1975, has also been studying the enzymes in a particular kind of bacteria that are able to fixate nitrogen without a plant.

"The advantage of using biological nitrogen fixation is that it will reduce the run off of nitrates into the river. Also, farmers will not have to purchase ammonia fertilizer for their crops," he said.

Tom Roche, head of the biochemistry department, said grants such as Davis' go toward several things within the department.

"The major purpose of the grant is to support personnel in the professor's endeavor," Roche said. "But some of the overhead money goes back into the department. A percentage of the money goes to pay such things as start-up packages for new professors, pay salaries, repair equipment and bring in speakers."

According to Davis, who has received other grants for his research, the grant will be used to study how mutations in the protein affect how the protein works.

"We are interested in how the enzyme does its job," Davis said. "We want to know what happens when you make a mutation and what does it do to the enzyme."

The grant, titled "Mutations Affecting the Fe Protein of Klebsiella Pneumoniae Nitrogenase," is for two years and will be used to support graduate students who are helping with the research.

"A research program such as Davis' is a typically sized program for the department," Roche said. "We feel it represents excellent work. The department will receive over $1 million in grant money this year, so his grant is a substantial one."

Concert close to being sold out

"... if someone's going to wait until the day of the show to get their tickets, they might not get a seat."

CHARLIE THOMAS

Radio promotions, country music awards help increase ticket sales

JODY LYNN
Collegian

Waiting until the last minute to buy a ticket for the Alan Jackson-Diamond Rio concert might not be a good idea.

The concert, set for 8 p.m. Friday in Bramlage Coliseum, is close to a sell-out, Bramlage director Charlie Thomas said.

"There are still tickets left right now, but if someone's going to wait until the day of the show to get their tickets, they might not get a seat," he said.

Thomas credited the recent success at the Country Music Association awards for a boost in the popularity of both acts and ticket sales.

"Both entities are extremely popular right now. They both have been doing well during the past six months. Both of them did very well at CMA," Thomas said.

"We were real fortunate to be in the right place at the right time to get these acts."

He also said additional promotions by local bars and radio stations are "an add-on" that also help to increase sales.

Jackson won Video of the Year honors at this year's CMA awards for "Midnight in Montgomery," an eerie tribute to Hank Williams Sr. At the same time, Diamond Rio was named the Group of the Year.

"Packaging is real important with these concerts when you don't have a real strong name like Garth Brooks, who can stand alone," Thomas said.

Since being named the top new male artist by both the Academy of Country Music and

ARCHITECTURE

Endowment honors former K-Stater

KRISTI STEPHENSON
Collegian

Manhattan buildings reflect the architectural work of the late Floyd O. Wolfenbarger, a K-State graduate. Now, his widow is helping students build opportunities in the College of Architecture and Design.

Lois Stingley Wolfenbarger donated $50,000 in honor of her late husband to the KSU Foundation. The gift will benefit students in the College of Architecture and Design.

"The donation was created as an endowment, meaning it will last forever," Foundation publications director Gordon Dowell said.

The scholarship will be awarded to incoming freshmen and transfer students, and the college will decide how the money will be dispersed.

Dowell said the Essential Edge Campaign, which has raised more than $136 million in gifts and pledges, includes this scholarship.

Wolfenbarger said she worried for 12 years about what to do to honor her late husband.

"I couldn't make the decision, so my trust adviser and income-tax expert came up with the idea, and I signed it," she said. "I wanted something in remembrance of Floyd."

Floyd Wolfenbarger was instrumental in designing many buildings in Manhattan, including McCain Auditorium, the Veterinary Medicine Complex, Manhattan Senior High School, Lee Elementary School, the Saint Mary Hospital, Memorial Hospital and more.

Wolfenbarger received various awards for architecture. He was elected to the College of Fellows of the American Institute of Architects, an honor presented for outstanding contributions.

Wolfenbarger said after her husband attended K-State, he spent seven years working in Boston. He opened his Manhattan office in 1934.

"We led a wonderful, fascinating life," Wolfenbarger said. "Floyd would be delighted with this contribution."

LATIN AMERICAN STUDIES

Paraguay open to K-State students

JANET SATTERLEE
Collegian

For the first time, K-State students have the opportunity to study for a semester in Paraguay.

Marcial Antonio Riquelme, Latin American studies director, said 16 to 18 students will be selected from K-State and the University of Kansas. They will arrive in Paraguay the third week of January and begin classes Feb. 4.

During the last 10 years, 10 to 15 graduate and undergraduate students from Paraguay have studied at K-State and KU, but no students have been able to study in Paraguay because of the dictatorship there, Riquelme said.

"Since there has been a transition to democracy, the country has opened up," Riquelme said.

Previously, faculty from the national and Catholic universities were dispersed around the city, because the dictator of Paraguay did not like the idea of one campus for all faculty and

LEADERSHIP WEEK

Thibodeau addresses ethics

Decision making marks Blue Key speech

JILL SCHRAG
Collegian

Fred Thibodeau, president of K-State Alumni Association, said he is no expert on ethics, but said he has more credentials than most of us.

Thibodeau spoke on "Ethics and Values in Decision Making" Wednesday in the K-State Union as part of Leadership Week, sponsored by Blue Key National Honor Society.

Thibodeau studied education, English and speech at K-State. He also has a Master's of Divinity and has been a United Methodist pastor. He is a candidate for a doctorate in higher education administration.

The first step in making a good decision is to understand the problem, Thibodeau said. Listening to people is crucial, and group or "participative" decisions tend to produce the best results, he said.

"It seems like common sense, but many decision makers don't like groups," he said.

Thibodeau said timing is also important. Sometimes there is no time for a participatory decision, and one person must make a decision.

"I try to look at all options, what's at stake, what the consequences are, and then choose the best one under the circumstances," he said. "I ask myself, 'Is it fair?' I make that decision, but someone has to pull the trigger, and that's what I get paid for."

Thibodeau said he follows three criteria in decision making.

First, he said he asks himself, "Do I believe what I'm doing is right?" Next, he asks, "Am I prepared to defend and justify what I'm doing?" His final question is "Does this stand go beyond

Lead has heavy effect on kids

THE ISSUE

A recent study indicates that even a small exposure to lead can severely harm infants and children.

WE SUGGEST

Warnings from experts about exposure should be heeded before more children are harmed.

For nearly 20 years now, the United States has been on the edge of its seat when the issue of lead poisoning is mentioned. But a new study out of Australia may show that all our worrying may not have been enough.

The effect of lead on children was the reason for the nation's shift to unleaded gasoline. We banned lead-based paint and encouraged its removal from houses. The country declared war on lead.

But the new study indicates that even trace amounts of lead exposure during infancy can later have serious effects on children. Similar American studies have had concurring results.

The New England Journal of Medicine has reported that exposure to lead can have effects on the IQ of school-aged children.

It was once thought that this condition only affected the poor, who lived in conditions where lead pipes and paint still existed. But the study concentrated on 494 children from mostly blue-collar and middle-class families in Australia's lead-smelting town of Port Pirie.

The level of concern in America is amounts over 10 micrograms per tenth of a liter. The children in Port Pirie had levels 2 1/2 times that amount when tested in 1979.

While this seems like a lot, a microgram is one-millionth of a gram, or about 1/28 of an ounce. It is thought that four million children in the United States possess lead levels high enough for concern about their conditions.

Though the amounts seem minuscule, their potential for harm is quite large. Writing for the New England Journal of Medicine, Dr. Kathryn R. Mahaffey of the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences said the findings "emphasize the intellectual cost of not preventing it."

With lead's potential for harm, Mahaffey's warning should be recognized.

There are things amiss concerning Athletic Fee hike

I can't believe Student Senate is considering raising our fees again. You would think these people had somehow found a way to avoid paying fees altogether, as many ideas as they have for increasing them.

I, as well as many of you out there, happen to be a full-time student. As such, I realize that by increasing fees a little bit here and there, Senate is really taking a bite out of my wallet.

Perhaps in comparison to the relentless increases in tuition we have suffered during the last few years, student fees are only minor annoyances. But minor annoyances are what I specialize in.

The latest proposed fee increase bred in the fertile mind of Senate is a n increase in the athletic fee, from $10 to $17 per semester.

A paltry seven dollars may not seem like much to a student who is paying $1,000 or more a semester in tuition and fees. But after a year, that adds up to enough to buy a CD. In my book, that qualifies as annoying and, therefore, worthy of further analysis.

Much of the money raised by the increase would go to the marching and pep bands, the baseball program and the Sports Club Council.

To tell the honest truth, these are worthwhile programs that are underfunded and deserve to get more money. I just don't think the money should come from an increase in our fees.

Here's why. From my reading of the way the athletic fee currently is used, and the way in which part of the money from the increase would be used, the fee works like a subsidy for ticket prices for students.

JOHN HAWKS

In other words, money from the athletic fee goes to reduce ticket prices. So, all students at the University are paying to send a few students to basketball and football games.

If this sounds fishy to you, you haven't been just snorting halibut. It sounds to me like a pretty good racket for the sports programs. Even if they field lousy teams no one wants to watch, they can still make money.

In cooperation with the KSU Foundation, Athletic Director Milt Richards has agreed to match the full fee amount paid by students if the fee increase is passed. What I don't understand is why it requires an investment by the students to get anything done on this campus.

It is not the job of students to build libraries on campus, nor it is their job to subsidize intercollegiate sports. If Milt Richards can find money to match that spent by the students, why doesn't he just spend it, instead of dangling it carrot-like in front of our noses?

This whole thing sounds like a scam to me. If there is money out there, they should spend it. Deserving programs like the bands should be financed by our current athletic fee, and the students who go to and enjoy sporting events currently subsidized by our athletic fee should be made to pay the full price for them.

And, if intercollegiate sports are going to continue to claim they bring huge amounts of money to the University, they should be forced to support themselves.

I know not all student senators are as willing to spend our money as others. It is for them I write this column.

The students will not support continued fee increases. Before Senate levies an additional penny, it should find out more fully where the money is going and how many students benefit from it.

Remember, the road to ending the chain of tuition and fee increases begins here.

TOLES

OTHER VIEWPOINTS

The apparent victory of disposables in the Great Diaper War reflects a human trait that must be maddening to those who hope to control other's behavior. People won't do something that makes no sense to them, even when the advertised reason for doing it could be viewed as a good one.

And it makes no sense to families with babies to give up the convenience of disposable diapers, despite the assault on disposables by zealous environmentalists who tried to make the throwaways a symbol for all that's wrong with the way Americans treat the environment. Disposable diapers, you see, end up in sanitary landfills; that's bad, even though that's what landfills are for.

The tale, of course, is about diapers only on one level. On another level, it's about common sense asserting itself over sensationalism and about the understanding that the costs of modern life, as symbolized by the convenience of disposable diapers, often are legitimate.

The strident advocates of cloth diapers, however, are willing to seriously inconvenience millions of mothers because disposables, as mentioned, end up in landfills and because—here's another heinous offense—they are made from paper which is made from trees and they also contain plastics. In this argument, the marginally adverse environmental impact of cloth diapers is ignored.

This zealotry was aimed at controlling behavior. Instead it has resulted in scrutiny of the claims made in its behalf. And as often happens in such cases, good sense apparently has prevailed.

The Greenville News, Greenville, South Carolina

The United Nations High Commission for Refugees says it is totally overwhelmed. It is already at a loss how to deal with the thousands of actual or former detainees. Last week it issued another appeal to the international community to take them in. Most are still in camps in Bosnia, because Western immobility has clogged the human pipeline through Croatia. With 600,000 refugees on its territory, the Croats are refusing to take any more.

Regrettably, as western Europe faces its biggest refugee crises since the end of the Second World War, it seems quite unable to meet the challenge. Worse, more effort is being exerted to devise ways of keeping them out then letting them in.

HOMOSEXUALITY

Reverend's bigotry shows the true light

Editor,

I feel I must respond to comments made by the Rev. Fred Phelps, Topeka minister, in your Nov. 3 article, "Gays may lose rights in Oregon."

Phelps says homosexuals do not deserve his acceptance or respect, because they have chosen a lifestyle of which he does not approve.

For shame, Rev. Phelps. Perhaps we have studied different Bibles and worshiped different Gods. Mine taught me to "Love thy neighbor."

Also, Rev. Phelps, not everyone in the United States studies and follows the Bible. This country's greatest strength is its diversity, and that includes religious diversity.

If being a Christian today also means being a narrow-minded bigot, it's time for me to convert. Thank you, Rev. Phelps, for showing me the light.

$1.75 mattered little. Keeping theater doors locked while a movie is being shown is unconscionable.

I've never taken a fire science course, but when I was an undergraduate working my way through college as a theater doorman, I remember being told to keep the front doors unlocked, because it was unlawful to lock them during a showing.

Those responsible for the operation of the K-State Union theaters should re-evaluate their policies. What's a $1.75 in lost revenue to the value of one life that might be lost because of the combination of a fire and a stampede?

Aside from the humanitarian issue, I imagine the policy is a direct violation of state and local fire codes. Consider the impact of a fire marshal walking in and shutting down theater operation.

Change the policy. Keep the doors open, and pay a person to monitor theater entrances after the closing of the box office.

UPC FILMS

Theater safety leaves much to be desired

Editor,

I would like to thank the UPC Kaleidoscope committee for presenting cinema that is not regular box-office fare.

I especially enjoyed "City of Hope," "Slacker," "Tatie Danielle" and "At Play in the Fields of the Lord," albeit many of these reels were projected slightly out of focus.

Since I did not partake of alcoholic beverages or ingest illegal substances, and my optometrist did not prescribe eyewear, I assume this "fuzzy" mechanical problem can be remedied in the projection booth.

I would like to have included the showing of "Naked Lunch" in the above list, on the sole merit that it was projected in focus.

However, when the projectionist showed the reels out of sequence, "Naked Lunch" became a severe case of indigestion. The film's bizarre Kofkaesque metamorphic treatment of the writer and the writing process is difficult to understand on its own merit, let alone dealing with an extrinsic twist of order caused by a projection mixup.

Since the movie was out of sequence, my artistic appreciation was out of kilter. I asked for a refund, and the ticket staff was pleased to oblige.

When I started to leave the theater, I nearly slammed my face through the glass door. It was locked. The ticket staff said the doors were kept locked to keep students from sneaking in.

All of sudden, the issue of

PRIORITIES

Almighty Athletics drying out wallets

Editor,

When is this University going to get its priorities straight?

On the front page of the Oct. 30 Collegian, there were two articles that proved we have yet to learn about priorities.

The first article stated that 1,800 serial titles subscribed to by Farrell Library will be eliminated by 1994. This is nearly 25 percent of the serials to which Farrell now subscribes.

The second article concerns a proposed student fee increase. Of course, this increase is not for something as ignoble as academics. It is the almighty athletic fee. Student Senate proposes to increase the fee from $10 to $17 for full-time students and from $3.50 to $8.50 for part-time students.

Notice if you will that the fee increase is not being put to the students. Senate made the mistake of asking the students what we thought a few years ago. When the students voted against the athletic fee in a referendum, the Senate passed it a year later. Now, Senate wants to increase it.

Farrell Library already lacks the resources needed by K-State students. Now those resources are going to be depleted further. Take it from me, it sucks when you have to drive to K-Who to get needed resources.

Call it a pipe dream, but I believe that one day the almighty athletic god will fall and be replaced by something more worthy.

Wildcat emotions should be elsewhere

We get sidetracked sometimes. The important and not-so-important get switched around.

That's not to say I don't find tonight's K-State-Iowa State football game intriguing. And I'm not at all avoiding the upcoming basketball season. In fact, my sentiments are quite the opposite. I can't wait.

As we all get ready to "Stuff the Stadium" and freeze our little rumps tonight, one man won't be part of the thousands in attendance. Instead, he'll be recuperating in a Wichita hospital room after suffering a heart attack and stroke.

Long-time "Voice of the Wildcats," Dev Nelson, or in some annals, Mr. K-State, continues to rest in the intensive-care unit at Saint Francis Regional Medical Center. While the Wildcats could certainly use a moral boost, Dev deserves our support and prayers.

Dev was either a broadcaster or the sports information director from 1954 to 1979. He has given much of his life to this University, and whatever K-State can do for him, it should.

Part of the reason I'm compelled to expound on this is because I'm in the same boat, albeit a smaller one. I can only hope to reach the same level, both as a broadcaster and as a person.

Soon after transferring to K-State, I received the Dev Nelson Scholarship, and it was quite an honor for me. To even be mentioned in the same sentence with Mr. Nelson meant a great deal.

For as long as I live, I will contend there are much more important aspects of life to concern ourselves with than our jobs.

This is one of them. Sportscasters are a different and special breed of people — totally the opposite of an engineer, an architect or a lawyer. No offense is meant to those individuals, but those lines of employment seem boring.

In sportscasting, you see the emotion, both joy and sorrow you don't always see in everyday life. It's like no other job, and one I wouldn't trade for the world.

Behind the microphones, off the TV set or without the pen, there are real people. People with feelings, thoughts, morals and appreciation. Not all sportscasters are egotistical pigs with egos the size of Mount Rushmore. I suggest to you that many sportscasters are in the business for the love of sports and people in general.

Dev is such a person.

Some of us were brought up to respect our elders and predecessors. Those of us in broadcasting take that to heart, because we learn from those before us.

Gentlemen like Johnny Most and Red Barber aren't around anymore, and I think it's time to show some appreciation for Dev Nelson.

This member of the K-State Sports Hall of Fame has seen the good, the bad and the ugly in Manhattan. He has stuck by this University, and now it's time for us to stand by him.

Rejoice in the fact that K-State is on ESPN tonight. Hopefully, it will continue to happen on a regular basis.

If you stay at home to watch the game or listen to it on radio, remember a piece of K-State will be missing.

Get well soon, Dev. K-State misses you.

Welcome home, K-State football

Cats search for winning ways after 4-game road trip

STEVE ROCK

Collegian

Home again.

After four weeks on the road — and four straight losses — the Wildcat football team returns to KSU Stadium for a nationally televised game at 7 p.m. today against the Iowa State Cyclones.

The road trip for K-State was the longest in 46 years.

Did the time away from home hurt the Wildcats?

"I don't know that it's the travel as much as it is the losing," Coach Bill Snyder said. "I think that's what wears and tears on anyone. Our guys are weary from that respect — the fact that we have not been successful on the road."

"We're pleased to be back home. I think that goes without saying."

The game features one team trying to find the winning edge and another that may have found it.

The 3-4 Wildcats, after winning their first three games of the season, are mired in a four-game losing streak. The Wildcats are 0-3 in conference play, which includes lopsided losses to both Kansas and Colorado.

Iowa State snapped a four-game losing streak of its own last week with a 28-14 victory over Missouri. The Cyclones are 3-5 on the season, 1-3 in Big Eight play.

One of Snyder's concerns in recent weeks, he said, has been the play of the punt coverage team.

Tonight, that unit will indeed be put to the test.

Iowa State's James "the Eel" McMillion leads the conference with 419 yards in 19 punt returns. His 22.1-yard average is second in the nation.

This season, McMillion has returned three punts for touchdowns, including a 78-yarder and a 91-yarder. Only three other players in Big Eight history have returned as many punts for touchdowns in a single season.

"Anybody that can score three times on a punt return — I don't care how many times they kick to you — that's a heck of an achievement," Snyder said. "I've been here for four years, and we haven't scored on one yet."

McMillion will be returning punts from the second-ranked punter in the nation. Wildcat senior Sean Snyder is averaging 48.3

yards a boot, a pace that would break the NCAA record of 48.2.

Despite last week's win, the Iowa State defense has been suspect. Against Kansas, the Cyclones yielded 514 yards of total offense. Against Iowa, the Cyclones gave up 447 yards of offense. In the last two weeks, Oklahoma State and Missouri had a combined total of 687 total yards.

Iowa State is giving up an average of 366 yards a game, including 225 through the air. And the Cats, Snyder said, need to be successful throwing the ball if they want to look for a win.

K-State passed just 10 times in last week's loss to Oklahoma. Quarterback Jason Smargiasso completed just four passes and also tossed an interception.

"We have to throw the football," Snyder said. "I've convinced myself of that. We just have to do it better."

But center Quentin Neujahr said the best Wildcat offense is the one that feels out the opposing defense and plays accordingly.

"Last year, we played give-and-take ball," he said. "Whatever the defense gave us is what we took. Last Saturday against Oklahoma, we got back to that. They gave us the run, so we took it."

And the Cats gained more net yards on the ground than they had in the previous four games combined.

For the Wildcats, tonight's game does more than give K-State a chance to get national exposure — it gives them a chance to get a win.

"I can't imagine anybody in this program wouldn't be extremely hungry for a victory," Snyder said.

MAJOR LEAGUE BASEBALL

Brewers' Listach chosen AL Rookie of Year

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Pat Listach, who failed to make the Milwaukee Brewers' opening-day roster, was voted the American League Rookie of the Year Wednesday.

The Milwaukee shortstop was chosen first on 20 of 28 ballots and received 122 points in voting from the Baseball Writers Association of America.

Cleveland outfielder Kenny Lofton was second with 85 points, followed by Seattle pitcher Dave Fleming with 23 and Milwaukee pitcher Cal Eldred with 22. Lofton got seven first-place votes and Eldred one.

"It came as a surprise, the difference in the voting," Listach said during a news conference Wednesday at Milwaukee's County Stadium. "I expected it to be a lot closer. I didn't know if I'd come in first or second."

Listach hit .290 with one homer and 47 RBI. He also stole 54 bases to break the Brewers' previous rookie record of 30, set by Paul Molitor in 1978.

"I didn't set any goals," Listach said. "I didn't even expect to be here this year."

Rookie manager Phil Garner sent Listach to the minors in his first round of spring training cuts, figuring Bill Spiers would be his regular shortstop.

But Spiers didn't recover from offseason back surgery, and the Brewers called up Listach one day after the season started.

"It's a long way once you think about it. I expected to start the season in Denver," Listach said. "I was fortunate enough to come in on opening day and get some chances to start."

"We all felt like he had the qualities to be an exciting player," Garner said. "We just didn't realize he would do it this soon. He was consistent all year. It seemed like just about every night he did something to help us win a ball game."

Listach, 24, was supposed to be a utility player when the Brewers brought him back, but his speed eventually earned him a starting role.

Listach, a switch-hitter with a .250 average in four minor league seasons, led all rookies in hits with 168 and scored 93 runs.

Lofton hit .285 with five homers, 42 RBI and 66 steals in 78 attempts for the Indians.

Fleming was 17-10 with a 3.39 ERA for the Mariners, and Eldred went 11-2 with a 1.79 ERA in 14 starts after Milwaukee brought him up.

ATLANTA (AP) — Manon Rheame, pro hockey's first woman goalie, signed a three-year contract Wednesday with the Atlanta Knights of the International Hockey League. Terms were not disclosed.

Rheame, 20, was listed at the start of the season as the Knights No. 3 goalie but hadn't suited up for home games. However, she was moved up to the No. 2 goalie on Monday when the parent club, the Tampa Bay Lightning of the NHL, called up goalie David Littman.

Rheame will travel with the team to Cincinnati on Friday.

Stadium might not be stuffed

FRANK KLEEMANN

"Stuff the stadium."

K-State's advertising campaign to fill KSU Stadium for the ESPN-televised football game was a success, although many empty seats will be seen on TV, Athletic Director Milt Richards said.

Richards said K-State doesn't expect to sell out the 42,000 seats on a cold week night.

"First at all, it's Thursday. It's on national television, and many fans outside of Manhattan choose to watch the game on their TV," he said. "I think 25,000 is a considerably good number."

K-State's ticket office reported 25,000 tickets sold, including about 15,000 season-pass holders, as of noon Wednesday.

Richards said the campaign helped increase the number of tickets sold.

"I'm convinced that if we didn't have this campaign, we would have only about 10,000 people in the stadium," he said.

In an attempt to have an impressive crowd at the night game, the athletic department gave free tickets to Manhattan grade-school children. The athletic department also offered fans ticket-packages for groups of 10 or more for a price of $9 each.

Students can purchase tickets for $7 at the Union.

However, considering the costs of the campaign, Richards said there will be no ticket give-aways before the game, as Kansas did when it played California on national television Sept. 24.

"We met with the student leadership and decided that it makes no sense to (give out free tickets)," he said. "We are not going to do that."

Employees Matt McMillen, Angie Johnson and Jack Key in the marketing department developed about 20 ideas to promote ticket sales for K-State's first ever ESPN appearance.

Activities to entertain fans include a fireworks display during halftime, music by the Fort Riley Cavalry and 1st Division Infantry band and a tailgate party sponsored by K-Rock.

The promotional campaign started the Friday before the Oct. 10 game with the Jayhawks. Hundreds of yard-signs with the logo "Stuff the Stadium" were placed on campus and around Manhattan.

The athletic department also bought commercial time on local radio and TV stations as well as ads in newspapers.

"I think the campaign was a success," Richards said. "They all gave a great effort."

Film industry brings profits to Kansas

SHEDERA BAUSCH

Kansas is fast becoming a hot site for film production, the state film commission says. Whether it be movies, TV shows, documentaries or commercials, the Sunflower state has found a spot in the world of film and commercial production. The Kansas Film Commission, based in Topeka, attracts film productions to Kansas to extend the state's economic development. Commission director Vicky Henley said Midwestern states know there is a lot of money to be found in the film industry.

"Economic development became the big buzz word," Henley said. And producers are suddenly looking beyond the lights of Hollywood because of location burnout and viewer sophistication, Henley said. Filmmakers who come to Kansas have brought millions of dollars into the state's economy. According to Henley, a movie producer spends about $33,000 each day on location in Kansas, and a commercial producer will spend $65,000. The money is not spent solely on the location site but in many other fiddle, hard-worn sound and lyrics that have been typical of country music in the past, Jackson also provides some variety and off-the-wall lyrics that have listeners tappin' their toes and singin' along. "A Lot About Livin' and a Little 'bout Love" is a must for any country music fan and proves a great follow-up to Jackson's last album "Don't Rock the Jukebox." Jackson sings of times growing up "way down yonder on the Chattahoochee where it gets hotter than a hoochie coochie" in his characteristic country mold. The album's title is misleading. Each cut on the release says a lot about love. In true country fashion, most of the songs talk about learning to live after losing someone. Some great two-steppin' songs and a faster-paced "Up to My Ears in Tears" and "Chattahoochee" show that Jackson is a master of western swing. "She Likes It Too" seems tailor-made for Jackson. He sings of a teenager who rides motorcycles and wears his hair long, to the dismay of his parents, to impress a girl. That shoulder-length hair and passion for motorcycles are the only things that branch from the traditional country mold with Jackson. "She's got the Rhythm (and I Got the Blues)," the current release from the album, is the only blues number, but Jackson shows a mastery of this style as well. The lyrics bridge traditional problems in a modern world. "I Don't Need the Booze (to get a buzz on)" combines the themes of getting drunk and finding the girl. "Mercury Blues" is at the other end of the spectrum where a man steals his friend's girl only to be ditched because he doesn't drive a "Mercury."

Is Dogged Tired just jumping the gun?

YOU'RE ASKING ME?

by Cassandra Duveaux

DEAR CASSANDRA,
This is in reference to "I Never Knew Lonely 'Til Now."

Where have you been all of my life? I've been trying to find someone like you for a long time. All the guys I know only date around, or in other words, "screw around," and I'm tired of meeting guys who only have sex on the mind.

I want somebody to love me for me and to respect me. I want them to be there for me and to just love to be with me and only me.

My answers to your questions are that there are still women out there who want to be with just one guy. I'm living proof.

Love is still out there, you just have to find someone that has the same interests, values and morals that you do.

Cassandra, my question is, could this be a possible match, or am I just jumping the gun a little too much?

Please respond.

Tired of Being Dogged

DEAR TIRED OF BEING DOGGED,
I think your expectations are reasonable. There are many men out there who could fill the description for the type of mate you just described. It simply takes time, and patience is the key.

Are you jumping the gun? No. But trying to pick up a guy based upon an anonymous letter in an advice column is probably not the wisest thing.

DEAR CASSANDRA,

This is in reference to a letter from Oct. 26. It is not always as easy as you make it sound to meet people on this campus. It seems that the majority of campus clubs are academic rather than social clubs. Aggieville is not for everybody.

So, if you are not in a Greek organization, what is a person to do?

I have lived in Manhattan all my life and still find this a very difficult town in which to meet people.

I know there are nice guys out there; it is just a matter of finding them — this is where the problem lies. I am a nice girl, reasonably attractive and like to have fun, but I still find it difficult to find a nice guy with whom I would like to spend time. Help.

Still Looking

DEAR STILL LOOKING,

I get many letters like yours each week, and I sympathize with you tremendously.

However, without actually going out and helping you look for the man of your dreams, I am not sure what else I can do.

I have found that when I am not satisfied with the way things are, the best thing to do is make a list of plans or ways to change the situation, list the advantages and disadvantages of each, pick what looks like the best one, and then execute the plan. Let me offer this column as a forum for discussing any ideas that you or others may have.

It appears to me one possibility that has generated considerable interest is the idea of a singles club, and maybe you are just the person to start it. Action!

DEAR CASSANDRA,

What kind of person are you? You have been brainwashed by the liberal media. They convinced you that women have rights.

I'm going to let you in on a secret — THEY DON'T! Women are here on this planet to satisfy the needs of men, and that's it! That is their only role in life.

Since the day of the caveman, men have dominated women, and that is the way it should be. They are only sex objects. Hopefully someday, you will wake up and realize this truth.

The Original D.W.

DEAR ORIGINAL D.W.,

Where are you writing from, Mars? No wonder you are having dating problems. Get counseling immediately.

Letters to Cassandra may be submitted in person or by mail to the Kansas State Collegian, c/o Cassandra Duveaux, Kedzie Hall 106, Manhattan, KS 66506.

Cassandra reserves the right to edit the content for the purpose of conserving space. Unless otherwise specified, all letters will be open to the public. Correspondence designated as "private" or "not for publication" will be maintained in the strictest confidence.

The advice presented in this column is solely the opinion of the columnist and does not reflect the opinion of the Collegian or K-State.

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for. Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations. Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

WE DO NOT USE PHONE NUMBERS OR LAST NAMES IN PERSONALS.

Program promotes exchange

Riquelme said Paraguay and Kansas are sister states and have participated in a "Companionship of the Americas" program for the last 25 years.

This program allows faculty from K-State, KU and Paraguay's Catholic and national universities to visit and to exchange projects, Riquelme said.

"This is a very good opportunity of knowing first-hand experience to learn the language and culture of Latin America," Riquelme said.

Riquelme said students must have a minimum of four semesters of Spanish.

The program costs about $3,500, which includes room and board, orientation, tuition and other fees.

Students may pay a $25 registration fee and qualify for financial aid to lower the cost, Riquelme said.

When students arrive in Paraguay, they will live with one family for the semester, Riquelme said.

"It's an opportunity to meet with a family and sustain a relationship with the family," he said. "It allows a student to be a part of a family and to get to know them."

Students also take classes and enroll in six hours of independent study, directed readings or an honors thesis.

Students should be able to have all credit hours transferred to K-State, Riquelme said.

Ethics necessary, Thibodeau says

"I have a 14-year-old who says his decisions are right if they feel good," Thibodeau said. "Well, I say, 'Not in my house.' Just because something is in my own best interest does not make it right. That is not a defensible ethical position."

"However, even people with opposing points of view can both be living by an ethical standard," he said.

People on both sides of the abortion issue have strong ethical positions, he said, even though they may disagree.

Thibodeau concluded his speech with advice for audience members.

"Don't think you have to win all the time or win at all to make a difference," Thibodeau said. "I think you have value just by your very being. Nothing you can do can add to that. You are valuable just because of who you are."

"Take each day as it comes. Break it down into manageable pieces, and then just get to work."

"Everyone here is going to be in a position where you have to make decisions, and you will have the opportunity to do what you believe is the right thing. All I ask is this: Do what you think is the right thing, the fair thing. Stick to that, and you'll be OK."

"The Arts and Sciences Core Committee recommended this, and I don't think we have enough information or have spent enough time to go against the Provost Committee's recommendation," Amy Smith said.

Rachel Smith, arts and sciences senator, said not having enough information was not a good reason to vote against the legislation.

Senate also passed a resolution opposing the discontinuation of the master's degree in public administration by a 36-5 roll-call vote.

This resolution also encouraged the president and the Provost Committee to search for other alternatives that could meet the goals of Role and Aspirations.

Senate also passed a resolution asking the president and the Provost Committee to encourage others to make the establishment of a minors program at K-State a priority.

The resolution is a result of a section in the Role and Aspirations report recommending the discontinuation of secondary degrees in International Studies and South Asian studies.

Until a minors program is implemented, students wishing to use courses in International and South Asian studies as concentration areas would not be able to do so unless the K-State catalog recognizes it as a course of study, said Student Body President Jackie McClaskey.

McClaskey said a section in the Role and Aspirations report suggesting it remain as an option will allow students to continue using the programs as areas of concentration.

Senators expressed concerns that discontinuing a program aimed at increasing cultural diversity would go against one of the main priorities of the Role and Aspirations report.

State attracts film industry

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 6 areas, such as lumberyards for set material, furniture rental stores for furniture for the set, and clothing stores for costumes. Grocery stores, restaurants and hotels also receive money from the film crews.

"Clean money is available through these filmings," Henley said.

Henley also said that by having film producers come to Kansas, it creates jobs for the community of the production. Community locals often make up 30 percent of the film crew, and usually the community is no worse for the wear.

"We're not losing any money by having to repair the film site. They leave the scene in the same or better condition," Henley said.

The Kansas Film Commission attends a location exposition in California to promote Kansas as a site for filming, but due to a limited budget, can't attend as many as it would like.

Becky Blake, employee of the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, has attended several of the expos to promote Kansas.

"We feel strongly that we need to support the effort to sell the image of Kansas," Blake said.

The image is exactly what they are selling, as Kansas has become the location for 42 films.

"The Day After" was the first big film to be produced in Kansas that helped change the image Kansas promoted as film site," Blake said.

Other popular movies that have been shot in Kansas include "Cross Of Fire," "Kansas," "Sometimes They Come Back" and "Twister."

U.S. & EUROPE

Punitive import tariffs imposed

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration, trying to force trade concessions for American soybean farmers, announced Thursday it was imposing punitive tariffs on $300 million worth of European imports.

The move would effectively triple the import price of a bottle of European white wine.

It also threatened to set off a full-scale trade war between the United States and the 12-nation European Community, America's biggest overseas market.

U.S. Trade Representative Carla Hills announced that effective Dec. 5, the tariffs on a 750-milliliter bottle of white wine from Europe would rise from 7 cents to 200 percent of the prices paid by importers.

American consumers would not likely feel the effects of the higher tariffs until January, because many importers have stockpiled shipments in anticipation of such a move.

Several importers said, however, if the tariffs take effect, virtually all European white wines would disappear from American stores, because the importers would cut off orders rather than risk being caught with expensive inventories they can't unload at triple the current price.

U.S. officials released a two-page list of 240 wines that would be hit with the higher tariffs.

The United States imported $270 million worth of white wine from Europe last year, with France supplying $125 million of that amount.

Other big suppliers were Italy, $98 million, and Germany, $35 million.

Wines from Spain, Portugal and Greece were also targeted for the new 200-percent tariffs.

In an addition to $270 million in white-wine imports, Hills also announced that 200-percent tariffs would be imposed on $30 million in imports of wheat gluten, primarily used as a binder in pet food, and in rapeseed oil, a cooking oil.

Germany is the principal European exporter of wheat gluten and rapeseed oil to the U.S. market.

Hills said she was delaying the effective date for the new tariffs to allow negotiators time for one last-ditch effort to resolve the underlying trade dispute involving American soybean sales to Europe.

LEADERSHIP WEEK

Good leaders have vision, drive

JODY LYNN
Collegian

Leaders who are passionately involved in achieving success know where they want to be, as well as the best ethical way to get there.

This was the message of Kansas Agriculture Secretary Sam Brownback, who spoke Thursday in the K-State Union as part of K-State Leadership Week, sponsored by Blue Key National Honor Society.

Brownback, a K-State graduate, has been the secretary of agriculture since 1986.

He said leaders must have a vision of what they want to accomplish, the desire to improve themselves, and a good sense of their values and beliefs to complement this passion.

"States, individuals, colleges and other institutions rise and fall because of the degree and quality of leadership they follow," he said.

"Taking the road of leadership can cost you. You'll have some hard times, but it can be very rewarding."

Good leaders don't get thrown into situations or positions in which they don't want to be, Brownback said.

"They're not only doing what they're doing, but they feel what they're doing. They aren't just going through the motions," he said.

It is important for a leader not to be so passionate that their enthusiasm scars off others, Brownback said. They have to build a consensus with their co-workers.

He said students, like leaders, need to look at where they want to be in the future. Although goals may not be specific, having focus and direction will help bring about success.

"I haven't seen anyone in leadership who hasn't set a direction for where they are going. They know where they want to be and work within their cone of opportunity to achieve their goals," Brownback said.

He said young people must prepare themselves today for the challenges of tomorrow and poise themselves to seize

Transition '93: The New Administration

Top CIA spot unattractive to 3

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Within 48 hours of Bill Clinton's election, three potential candidates had already removed themselves from the running for top administration jobs.

Speculation had Oklahoma Sen. David Boren, and retired Admirals William Crowe and Bobby Inman as possible CIA directors in a Clinton administration.

Crowe "is not interested," aide Jay Coupe said.

A former head of the Joint Chiefs of Staff under President Reagan, Crowe endorsed Clinton and gave him the imprimatur of the defense establishment when the presidential candidate was under fire for avoiding service in Vietnam.

Crowe has had no discussions with Clinton about the CIA job or about becoming secretary of defense — another position for which he has been prominently mentioned, Coupe said.

"Forty-seven years in service is enough," he said.

Inman, a former deputy CIA director, said in an interview he was not interested in a full-time Washington job.

Boren, outgoing chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, has told Clinton he is not interested in the job, said an informed source who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Boren himself said in a speech in Boren's counterpart on the House side, Rep. Dave McCurdy, also an Oklahoma Democrat, appears still in the running for the CIA job.

Current CIA Director Robert Gates may be asked to remain for several months after Clinton takes office in January to ensure a smooth transition, said informed sources who also asked not to be identified.

Clinton probably won't make any announcements of top jobs until next week.

Western officials say Saddam hiding weapons on trucks

ASSOCIATED PRESS

AMMAN, Jordan — Saddam Hussein is moving scores of Scud missiles around Iraq on camouflaged trucks so U.N. weapons inspectors can't find them, Western officials and other sources say.

He has also buried an unknown number of rocket boosters, they said.

One intelligence operative described it as a "real game" of hide-and-seek.

During the past 18 months, U.N. weapons inspection teams have tracked down and dismantled much of Iraq's nuclear, chemical and biological weapons programs, as well as its surface-to-surface missiles with a range of 90 miles or more, in accordance with the terms of the 1991 Persian Gulf War ceasefire agreement.

But American and U.N. officials suspect Saddam has stashed away some of the 819 Scud-B missiles he acquired from the former Soviet Union during the 1980-88 war with Iran, or longer-range al-Hussein and al-Abbas variants Iraq developed.

Tim Trevan, spokesman for the U.N. Special Commission charged

► HIGHWAY PLAGUED BY VIOLENCE

JACKSONVILLE, Fla. (AP) — Random shootings and a fatal assault by rock-throwers have prompted the American Automobile Association to warn drivers away from Interstate 295.

About 19 confirmed violent incidents have been reported since June, and 100 other reports are unconfirmed by police. There have been no arrests.

Sheriff Jim McMillan said he is asking the Florida National Guard for help in providing night-vision equipment and possibly troops to patrol the highway.

"This is not vandalism or a malicious act. This is attempted murder," he said.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION

Liking Ike — 40 years later

■ Session registration begins at 8:30 a.m. today. The final session will end at 4:30 p.m. Sessions are free. There will also be a reception at 6:45 p.m., and a dinner a lecture. Cost of dinner is $15.

Eisenhower's campaign subject of forum in Abilene

DEBORAH WHITSON
Collegian

The election has come and gone, but the peculiarities of the candidates and comparisons to other campaigns will not soon be forgotten.

A panel of campaign experts from former President Eisenhower's 1952 presidential campaign will have a forum today at the Dwight D. Eisenhower Library in Abilene.

The panel will discuss Ike's campaign and nomination, and focus on similarities between that campaign and the independent candidacy of Ross Perot this year.

The program commemorates the 40th anniversary of Eisenhower's election in 1952. A write-in campaign at the state primaries led to his nomination at the Republican National Convention that year.

The discussion will be led by Ray Scherer, former NBC correspondent, who covered the 1952 election and the Eisenhower campaign.

Among the panelists are Herbert Brownell, Eisenhower's 1952 campaign manager, who later became U.S. Attorney General, and Harold Stassen, a contender who withdrew from the race at the 1952 convention.

Various Eisenhower staff members and people who propelled him to the White House make up the rest of the panel.

There will be three sessions: "In Search of a Candidate: The Quest for the Nomination," "Over the Top: Victory in Chicago" and "The Campaign: Strategy and Issues, A Retrospective."

Student cleans up

Senior to work for the Energy Department

LISA COLE
Collegian

A K-State senior is helping the Department of Energy clean up.

Jarad Daniels, senior in chemical engineering, has received a position in the DOE Environmental Restoration and Waste Management Employment program.

"The purpose of the program is to train scientists and engineers to work in the DOE," said Colleen Babcock, program manager for the Environmental Restoration and Waste Management Employment program.

Daniels said he will be doing practical work experience with DOE in the summer as part of the employment program. He said it is a hands-on experience designed to give participants experience with how DOE operates.

"The Department of Energy is the government agency in charge of the disposal of all government waste," Daniels said. He said this waste includes anything from nuclear waste to waste from government laboratories.

Daniels said he is hoping to do his research on bioremediation, a method of cleaning up waste.

"Bioremediation is basically the decontamination of waste using plants and microorganisms," he said. "It offers a more economical alternative to going in and decontaminating by mechanical means."

Bunny bite sparks debate

Classroom pet put to sleep after grade school student bitten

KIRSTEN NELSON
Collegian

A recent decision to test a classroom pet for rabies after biting a child has sparked debate over Kansas and Shawnee county testing policies.

A rabbit was destroyed after biting first-grader Chelsi McArdle Oct. 21 at Indian Hills Elementary School in Topeka. The bite broke the skin and caused bleeding.

The rabbit was immediately ordered for rabies testing by Dr. Kate Rathbun, agency chief of the Topeka-Shawnee County Health Agency. To be tested for rabies, an animal must be put to sleep.

Later that day, the rabbit was sent to K-State's veterinary laboratories for testing. The results were negative for rabies.

Grant and Andrea Glenn, who donated the rabbit to the school, were notified of the bite and the testing.

"I'm a parent. If an individual told me my child had been bitten by an animal, I would be worried," Grant

Glenn said. "If there was concern, I would want it tested."

"What we became angry with was being told it was a state statute that it be sacrificed," he said.

He said he thought state regulation said the animal should be saved, unless it becomes obvious it needs to be destroyed.

Rathbun said under state law, any animal that bites someone is to be appropriately tested. For dogs and cats, the incubation and contagious periods are well-known, and these

Canada faces state watershed

THE ISSUE

Canada is suffering from ethnic unrest and dislike for its ruling body.

WE SUGGEST

Any breakaway, especially on the part of Quebec, would only weaken the nation and set a precedent for others to follow.

Imagine a country politically torn by ethnic nationalism and intense dislike for its leader and ruling body.

Somalia? Czechoslovakia? Bosnia?

No. It's our neighbor to the north, Canada.

It's difficult to imagine how a country as inherently peaceful as Canada could be going through such dramatic change. Quebec is making strides for independence. And the recent Canadian referendum was rejected.

And no one has yet emerged with the energy to redirect Canada on the course toward unity.

The country is admired for its lifestyle, with people more prone to ethnic tradition than ethnic feuding. It shares with us the longest unguarded international border in the world.

Canada hardly comes to mind when global hot spots are mentioned.

It is obvious that the process of democratic reform has been poorly handled by Canadian leadership. Prime Minister Brian Mulroney and his progressive Conservatives seem unable to stem the tide of unrest, especially in Quebec.

The fact that Quebec has always virtually considered itself independent certainly cannot help matters any.

For Canada to remain strong, it must remain united. A breakup would make trade with the United States — its biggest trading partner — much more difficult.

Worse still, Quebec would be in danger of suffering from ethnic obscurantism and divisiveness.

With much of the world already in the midst of tearing itself apart, it would be a great shame to see Canada throw its hat into the crumbling ring.

Classroom must harbor diversity

With all the hoopla and media coverage from the presidential election fresh in our minds, it's time to regain some perspective.

As Americans, we're not nearly as important as we think we are. Reminding us of our relative insignificance, historian James Lance has pointed out that more than 80 percent of the world's population and the world's sovereign nations lie outside of what is considered to be the Western world.

Even within our own borders, non-Euro-Americans are expected to make up one-third of the U.S. population and more than one-third of the U.S. student population.

But despite the reality of multiple cultures clashing and merging at a larger, social level, multiculturalism in the classroom is far from the norm in most American schools.

Cries of educational tyranny and system-imposed fascism have kept many educators from adopting reforms.

Nevertheless, if teachers were able to effectively address cultural differences and likenesses, our students would be one step closer to understanding and solving cultural intolerance, racial oppression and ethnic violence.

Classroom curriculum and teacher behavior shape student attitudes and ideologies, and the classes at K-State should be no exception.

We need educational strategies that work to debunk cultural misconceptions and ethnocentric beliefs. These are necessary to build acceptance and tolerance for ethnic ideals and values.

How can we take advantage of the consciousness-raising that a multicultural approach in education promises?

To begin with, we must reorient our thinking. Right now, multiculturalism is treated as a side-thought, important only during Black History Month or on International Women's Day. The approach must be more integrated.

Specific teacher behaviors that may help to foster a new mindset include inviting outside speakers from different cultural and ethnic backgrounds into the classroom.

Local professionals, civic leaders, representatives from various student organizations and visiting professors are usually anxious to speak about their backgrounds and customs.

Instructors should also encourage multicultural issues to be used as speech, paper and discussion topics. Specific support material might even be provided, such that students be required to produce work from a given reading packet.

Topics should be related to the class, including human rights, alternative lifestyles and cultural differences. Other topics would have similarities found in music, art, language, food, clothing, holidays and customs.

As students are evaluated for their performance in any given class, teachers must allow for diversity in approach. Writing and speaking styles may differ, depending on cultural background.

Classroom procedure should be altered, as well.

Small group discussions and activities between students should be encouraged. Interaction based on a sense of collaboration and community, rather than one of competitive individualism, fosters respect in a more supportive environment.

Finally, our University must be aware of the ethnocentrism implicit in what's probably the most popular testing procedure for our undergraduate courses. The emphasis placed on standardized, multiple-choice testing does not reflect the needs or experiences of many of our students.

Students and teachers alike must demand a stronger and more integrated multicultural approach. Teaching methods and curriculum should be made more sensitive to the needs of our diversified student body.

DAVID FILIPPI

Graceland is the Mecca for seekers of the unique life

"The Mississippi Delta was shining/Like a National guitar/I am following the river/Down the highway/Through the cradle of the civil war."

— Paul Simon, "Graceland"

Indeed, when the sun is shining just right on a warm October Saturday morning, the Mississippi Delta does shine like a National guitar. I have finally seen it with my own eyes.

In March, I sent off a paper proposal to a conference scheduled to be in Memphis. Even as I sent off my abstract, the idea took hold in my mind — after I took care of business, I would go see Graceland.

By the time I found out my paper had been accepted, the presentation of an academic paper at a stuffy old English conference had puffed in comparison to my dreams of Graceland.

The trip to Chez Elvis is all I have talked about these last few months, knowing the visit would offer some great spiritual healing and revelation.

I can't exactly pinpoint when I became fixated with this whole idea of "Elvis as Icon."

As a rule, my musical heroes tend to lean more toward folks like Keith Richards and Jerry Garcia. Up until a few months ago, when I started digging on the King's actual music, I thought he was more solid than substance. But I have become a true believer.

As I stood at the front door of Graceland with my reluctant companion — my mother, who went along just to humor me — waiting for the tour to begin, she asked me just what the deal was with Elvis.

I tried to explain that he is America itself. He represents the death and corruption and prostitution of everything that is unique and wild and good in our society.

Somehow, I can never seem to leave my rhetoric behind, because even on the steps of Graceland, I found myself quoting from "Das Capital." I raged about Reaganomics as the other pilgrims began to stare.

"I think you Birkenstocks are too tight," Mother said. "They're cutting off the circulation to your brain. You really need to lighten up, kiddo."

Maybe she's right. It is an occupational hazard. No wonder English department folks are such dreadfully serious people. You put so much energy into comma splices and sentence structure and syntax and French deconstruction that you forget such things don't matter to the general population.

Whether you're grading awkward freshman compositions or writing the "Great American Novel," still, it is just words. It is not something you can touch, like carpentry or building bridges. I live my life in books and words and ideas that are at best subjective, and nothing really seems concrete.

But Graceland — three TV sets in every room and tacky interiors — is something real, something I can touch. Well, maybe not literally on the budget-rate $7.95 tour, but you can press your nose up against the glass.

And it is something that must be experienced firsthand. Walking among the gold records and sequined jumpsuits, you forget about the rhetoric and the man's tragic ending. You can once again get a feel for the innocent country boy who literally changed the world.

Watching a videotape of an old press conference in Vernon Presley's office, I didn't even feel the slightest urge to correct Elvis' grammar. I just wanted to feed on his energy.

And I guess that is really what I had hoped to find on this trip — the innocence, the energy. Something that transcends the rhetoric and disillusion that is modern life.

He has become a strange muse for me. Where everyone else in my office has photos of "serious" literary figures posted above their desks for inspiration, I am surrounded by Elvis photos. Just to keep life real, to give me someone I can touch.

I guess I didn't need to travel all the way to Memphis and Graceland to figure all that out. But I sure had a great time in the gift shop.

DONATIONS

Giving to the needy won't solve problem

Editor,

The time is here for the annual food and clothing drive to provide for the needy.

By the end of this holiday season, winter coats and canned goods will have been distributed by the truckloads to scores of unfortunate persons in our midst.

These efforts will yield countless hours of campus and community volunteers' labor, worthy of praise from all of us. But, although praiseworthy, these efforts address the symptoms, not the causes, of the maladies faced by the unfortunate.

For the time being, canned goods may keep their stomachs full, and coats may keep them warm, but these well-meaning gestures may do little to increase the recipients' capacity to purchase coats and canned goods on their own.

Once the goods run out, and the coats become threadbare, we'll come through with more food and clothing — again and again.

Granted, it's better than doing nothing at all. But, unfortunately, the poor will remain poor.

It's fairly easy for us to place the discarded coats or cans of corn in the dropbox and walk away "feeling good" about ourselves.

Yesiree, we've done our part, and, by golly, we'll do it again — year after year. We learn to do this as kids. We get booster shots in college (look around you) and in the real world as "responsible" adults. But, still, the poor will remain poor.

We do just fine in providing a temporary salve for a festering wound, but we can't seem to find (or have the will to provide) a way to close the wound to prevent it in the first place.

We just plod along with the clothing and food drives. But, again, the poor will remain poor. Is this worthy of "feeling good" about?

CLINTON

U.S. should unify under new president

Editor,

In light of the election of Bill Clinton to the presidency, I have noticed a widespread negative reaction of many non-Clinton supporters.

Upon noticing that many people voted Bush — and the surprising turnout for Perot — around K-State, it does not surprise me that Clinton's "landslide" has upset these supporters a great deal, to the point of criticism of Clinton's character to the nation being overrun by spotted owls under Gore.

I just have to say that we must give the Clinton/Gore administration a chance to prove itself and understand that history will not remain stagnant for long without some change.

especially after 12 years of similar administrations that were itching for change.

Americans must accept that fact now and support these two, as Bush even said, to the best of our ability.

As for the spotted owl critics, I hope you can live with global deforestation, masses of people dying from human pollutants not yet imaginable and should-have-been cures that will never be if we held your environmental regard.

Get with the program. And read up on the owl if it worries you so.

HURLING OBJECTS

Being a Cat doesn't mean throwing junk

Editor,

At every football game, oranges, as well as other debris, shower throughout the stands and down onto the field. This show of "support" has grown tiresome.

I like having fun as much as the next guy, but this is childish and serves no visible purpose.

Who does this help? Not the players. Not the coaches. Not even the fans. It just becomes a distraction to the players and coaches.

It may not seem like a big deal, but inevitably, someone is going to get hit and possibly hurt.

Let's not wait until this happens to learn our lesson. It used to be funny, but the novelty has worn off. We can cheer for the Cats without throwing garbage.

PARKING

Parking Services can just leave Rec alone

Editor,

I am concerned with the parking situation at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

Currently, between the hours of 7 a.m. and 4 p.m., you must either have a student permit, a temporary permit or plug the meters. This is really inconvenient for those of us who live on the other side of campus and do not own a parking permit.

The Rec Complex receives no money from the sale of these permits, or from the parking tickets written on this lot. The complex receives money from our student budget.

I think Parking Services could find other places to have permit lots, instead of at the Rec.

In a way, we are paying for a service that should be free to us as students. I do not think this is right or fair.

Hopefully, in the near future, this lot will become a free lot, or a Rec permit lot only.

Serious filming

MHS students aim their cameras for the stars

Take a cult attempting to lead the world to peaceful future; add a sadistic, demented leader; mix in some students, and you have the recipe for an award-winning movie.

At least that's the idea Clarence Productions has about its latest film.

Clarence Productions is made up of five Manhattan High School students who have made a hobby of making movies. Members of the company are Steve Balderson, Jennifer Dreiling, Kate McCulloh, Amy Corinne and Paul Paukstelis.

This creative bunch got its start much like the pop heroes Wayne and Garth — on public access. Unlike the "Wayne's World" twosome, however, these students have already had non-fictional careers with actual results.

"We did a television show on cable Channel 6," Balderson said. "People saw it, and we were notified of a competition in New York, so we did a movie for that. It was the first experience any of us had with making a movie," he said.

That movie, finished in 1991, was "The Visionaries."

"It's the story of teen-agers at a boarding school, and how one of them starts having dreams that someone is trying to kill them," Dreiling said. "It sounds really corny now."

But some people didn't think it was corny at all.

"The Visionaries" was a semi-finalist at the New York City High School Festival in February 1992. It also received second-place honors in the Kan Film Festival in Overland Park in June 1992.

Clarence Productions' second movie, "Bus Stop Goodbyes," was finished early in 1992. It dealt with the frustrations of four high-school students and the limitations imposed on them by the people in the small, rural Southern town in which they live.

It was this film that gave the company the attention it needed to be taken seriously.

"Our friends thought the first film was pretty neat," Corinne said.

"But after the second film, people started to realize we were serious about it. It's kind of frustrating when people don't take you seriously and don't think this is what you want to do."

Balderson said, "It has gotten a lot harder with the second two films. But I think the difficulties have been worth it, because the result has been better movies."

According to a promotional pamphlet, Clarence Productions' goal is to creatively express the members' beliefs, ideas, fears, joys and concerns through the media of film and video.

These ideas include a belief in self-expression, Balderson said. This is one reason the company has no ties to Manhattan High School.

Balderson said they use privately owned equipment for production and have no help from the school.

"I'm a strong believer in expressing my thoughts with art forms. I wouldn't want to change anything to fit what the school wants," he said.

Clarence Productions' latest effort is called "By the Light of the Moon."

Corinne said it's their best film.

"There is a lot more character development," she said. "There is a better plot, and the mechanics of the filming are much better, also."

But don't take their word for it.

The group sent the script to Lou Hunter, a former NBC executive who is now a teacher at Johnson County Community College.

"When we got the script back, he had written on it that it was 'very good,'" Balderson said. "Then, the word 'good' was crossed out and replaced by 'excellent.' It was exciting when all the hard work paid off."

"By the Light of the Moon" premieres Saturday at the Wareham Opera House.

Steve Balderson, Jenny Dreiling (top) and Amy Corinne are three of five Manhattan High School students who are members of the creative movie company Clarence Productions.

Regulations questioned animals may be quarantined and kept under observation.

But for animals in which the incubation and contagious periods are not well-known — like rabbits — the regulations says they must be destroyed, Rathbun said.

And Dr. Deborah Briggs, assistant professor of veterinary medicine at K-State, said a specific exception to the regulation, enacted in 1981, leaves the decision for rabies testing in gerbils, hamsters, mice, rats, squirrels and other species not ordinarily known to transmit rabies to be left to the discretion of the health officer.

Grant Glenn said the problem in Shawnee County is that the health official has a standing order to destroy all animals that bite except dogs and cats.

"They should look at each bite on a case-by-case basis," he said. "I respect the right of a parent to say 'I'd feel better if it was tested for my child's safety.' But let the request be made, before someone says to destroy it."

Rathbun said Topeka-Shawnee County's policy is — and always has been — that if "a human being is bitten, and there is a biological possibility for rabies, although unusual, if the animal is available, it will be tested."

"It would be unreasonable to think they have rabies if they spent all of their life in the classroom, but they don't," Rathbun said. "No responsible adult can tell you where an animal has been all of its life."

"In this case, there has been a lot of focus on the rabbit, but as the health officer I have to focus on the child," she said.

And Chelsi McArdle's father said: "The life of our child is more important than the rabbit."

A case of rabies in a rabbit has never been reported in Kansas, Rathbun said. But that doesn't mean it can't happen.

"Once it moves into a species, it tends to spread in the species until it becomes a significant problem," she said.

Daniels to research

Because the employment program is financed by an act of Congress, Daniels is required to work for DOE after graduation for the same amount of time DOE paid for his schooling, Babcock said.

Babcock said the bill authorizing the employment program was enacted in March, and Daniels is one of the first 18 students to be part of the program.

She said she hopes to add 20 students to the program in spring.

About 400 students applied for DOE scholarships last fall, Babcock said.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Cats break 4-game losing streak

DAVID MAYES/Collegian

Gerald Benton, K-State wide receiver, dives for a pass during the second quarter of the Cats' 22-13 win against Iowa State Thursday night in KSU Stadium. The game was nationally televised on ESPN.

STEVE ROCK Collegian

Sparked by Eric Gallon's 164 rushing yards, C.J. Masters' three interceptions and two blocked punts early in the game, the Wildcats snapped their four-game losing streak in a nationally televised win over the Iowa State Cyclones.

But K-State coach Bill Snyder said the 22-13 victory wasn't worthy of the fans' post-game celebration. And he said he was disappointed that some of the 23,815 in attendance chose to tear down one of the goalposts.

"I think there are selected games that I'd jump in there and tear them down," he said, but Thursday's victory over the 3-6 Cyclones wasn't one of them.

Thursday's victory was, however, the first conference win of the season — the new season — for the Cats.

"What was behind us was behind us," Snyder said. "We dedicated ourselves to a new season. It took a commitment out of 115 young guys and coaches to do that."

For the Wildcats, the success of the new season started early. The Wildcat special teams unit blocked the first two Cyclone punts, setting up the offense for two early touchdowns.

After two Wildcat possessions — six plays, 33 yards and 97 seconds — the Cats had a 12-0 lead.

"Our compliments to K-State," Cyclone coach Jim Walden said. "They got after our punt team and did a nice job with our punts."

Gallon, who gained 315 yards through the first three games, returned to his early-season form. He averaged nearly seven yards a carry, and his 56-yard scoring jaunt in the fourth quarter was the longest run of his career.

Gallon now has 1,874 career yards, moving him past Cornelius Davis for second on the all-time Wildcat rushing list.

How important is it to the Cats that he have a good game? Gallon has seven career 100-yard rushing games. K-State is 7-0 in those games.

"He looked awfully good," Snyder said. "He was my Heisman candidate running down that sideline."

Masters intercepted three Cyclone passes, giving him six for the season. He leads the Cats in that category.

He thwarted a Cyclone rally early in the second half after Iowa State had traveled 34 yards.

Masters intercepted two more passes in the fourth quarter, one of which was thrown into the end zone.

"Right now, it feels like a burden is coming off of our backs," he said. "We let down the last couple of weeks, but we're coming around."

For the second time in as many weeks, quarterback Jason Smargiasso threw just twice in the opening half. His one completion was good for a five-yard loss.

He finished the game with six completions in 10 attempts, good for 40 yards.

In the last two weeks, the Wildcat air attack, which was second in the Big Eight last year, has a combined total of 10 completions and 104 yards.

"We're trying to circumvent our weaknesses and play whatever strengths we have," Snyder said.

Against the Cyclones, that strength was the running game. K-State finished with 201 yards on the ground and averaged more than 4.3 yards a carry.

Iowa State staged somewhat of a fourth-quarter rally, scoring all 13 points in the final period. The Cyclones put together drives of 90 and 69 yards to pull within nine.

But Masters kept the Cats ahead with some key interceptions.

K-State's kicking game struggled once again. Starter Warren Claassen missed an extra point and booted a kickoff out of bounds, giving the Cyclones the ball at the 35-yard line.

But Tate Wright, who had lost his field-goal kicking job to Claassen, connected on a 21-yard field goal and also made an extra point.

"He may be the guy," Snyder said. "Whoever hits it through those two white posts will be the one."

That is, of course, if those two white posts are still standing.

SPORTS DIGEST

► TRACK AND FIELD TEAM UNDER INTERNAL INVESTIGATION

The K-State track and field program is under an internal investigation, according to an article in Wednesday's Manhattan Mercury.

The article stated the University is looking into five to 10 instances in which money was given to an athlete once enrolled in school.

According to the article, the majority of the help was made to athletes who have already left the program. The article also says the investigation has been going on since early October and is expected to be completed before Thanksgiving.

K-State associate athletic director Jim Epps, who, with Big Eight faculty representative Bob Snell, is reported to be in charge of the investigation, had no comment Thursday. Athletic director Milt Richards said the same thing.

Richards did say, however, that if such an event were to occur, "we would make an appropriate comment at that time."

► DREAM TEAM, MCCLAIN HONORED

COLORADO SPRINGS, Colo. (AP) — USA Basketball named the U.S. Olympic basketball team its Male Athlete of the Year Thursday.

The Dream Team, featuring 11 NBA players and Christian

Laettner of Duke, won the gold medal in Barcelona.

Katrina McClain, twice a member of the U.S. women's Olympic team, was named the organization's Female Athlete of the Year for a second time.

Punt blocks propel K-State to victory

Rawling's, Randolph's successful blocking attempts get Cat offense rolling

BRIAN ANDERSON Collegian

Two consecutive blocked punts by Kitt Rawlings and Thomas Randolph in the first quarter helped K-State get its first Big Eight win of the year, defeating the Iowa State Cyclones 22-13.

After last week's blocked punt by Randolph, the total of three blocks are the most in a single season since the arrival of Coach Bill Snyder.

"The coaches did a good job," Rawlings said. "We practiced all week for blocking the punts. Coach (Nick) Quartaro did a great job."

Iowa State punter Jon Schnoor was unable to get his first kick off at the Cyclones 35-yard line as Rawlings got his hands on the ball. The junior returned the ball 24 yards to Iowa State's 11.

"I went past the center, and Randolph and me got through,"

Rawlings said of his first career block. "The up-back tried to play both of us, but we still got by. I lost my balance when I was trying to get the ball. So, I just fell on it."

Two plays later, J.J. Smith ran 11 yards to give K-State a 6-0 lead.

Schnoor also failed to get his second punt attempt off at the Iowa State 33-yard line when a swarm of Cats converged on the Cyclone kicker. Randolph deflected the ball as it went out of bounds at the Cyclone's 22-yard line.

One minute later, Jason Smargiasso ran four yards for the second K-State touchdown.

"Blocking the two punts was great," Randolph said. "We wanted to give the offense a short field to play on."

Last week, Randolph set up K-State's first drive when he blocked the kick in Oklahoma's 16-14 win.

Snyder said, "We've got to come out and get them (the defense) three and out, and then let the special teams try to make something happen."

Iowa State coach Jim Walden said the Cats found many holes in his team's line.

"They blocked the punts," Walden said. "They evidently must have seen something in the films. We have fakes to take care of that, but we didn't get it faked."

"We were very aware of the fact that when they line up eight, they pretty much brought eight, and we just didn't get it done. It's just an absolute breakdown in our punt protection.

"Their eight ran over our eight." Special teams coach Quartaro said the blocks at the beginning of the game gave K-State a lot of momentum.

"We felt good that we could get two blocks," he said. "We found a flaw in their formation and felt we had the ability to get it done. In our practices, we knew it was something we could do."

"It's a hell of a thrill. I've never done it as a coach."

NATIONAL FOOTBALL LEAGUE

Chiefs hoping to find early-season success

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — When the Kansas City Chiefs get back in action Sunday, look for tougher defense inside the 20, improved kick coverage and the same play-em-one-at-a-time philosophy that characterizes everybody else in the league.

That's what Marty Schottenheimer said he will be looking for after drilling those fundamentals into a team that arrived at its bye week by losing three of its last four games.

"We've had a chance to analyze the things that have gone on and where we need to improve," the Chiefs' head coach said. "We've been able to focus on those things. The players have worked their tails off in the last three practice sessions. I think we're all going to benefit from them."

The Chiefs, 4-4, probably couldn't have picked a better time for their bye week. A 27-3 loss on Oct. 25 to Pittsburgh was easily the sorriest performance in Schottenheimer's five-year regime.

"We looked in-depth at everything — offense, defense, kicking game. We spent three practices working very hard on some of those things we feel we need to improve on."

Both the offense and the defense concentrated on the way they've been operating close to the goal line.

"We spent a lot of time working on that area, on offense and defense," Schottenheimer said. "Our percentage of scoring touchdowns in that area is not good enough."

"More importantly, there have been eight situations the opponent has had a first and goal against us. And every time, they scored a touchdown. We're batting zero percent."

"You can't do that. A year ago, I think they scored touchdowns 60 or 65 percent of the time, which is a heck of a lot closer to what we're looking for."

Schottenheimer decided this problem was not traceable to personnel.

"When people get down in there, it's an attitude. You've got to find a way to stop them," he said. "A year ago, we were able to find a way. We've spent quite a bit of time on that."

Nevertheless, Schottenheimer said that his team overall does not have an attitude problem. After beating the then-unbeaten Eagles 24-17 on Oct. 11, Schottenheimer said, "we were being hailed as geniuses on the coaching staff, and the team was being lauded."

The Chiefs are home Sunday against San Diego, which lost its first four and then won its last four and is now challenging the Chiefs and Broncos in the AFC. Kansas City opened the season with a 24-10 victory at San Diego.

BIG EIGHT CONFERENCE

KU football getting more TV exposure

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LAWRENCE — Everyone loves a winner.

And the television networks are as guilty of it as anyone.

Before this season, the Kansas Jayhawk football team had appeared on national television only five times in 10 years. But with a 7-1 record and a No. 13 national ranking, Kansas will play on national television for the third and fourth times this season in the next two weeks.

The Kansas-Nebraska game will be shown on ESPN at 6:30 p.m. Saturday from Lincoln, Neb., and the Jayhawks' home game with Colorado was picked up by ABC for a regional broadcast Nov. 14 at 2:30 p.m.

Kansas lost to California 27-23 Sept. 24 in a Thursday night ESPN game. The game with K-State was broadcast on a tape-delay by Prime Network Oct. 10.

The last time Kansas appeared on national television three times in one season was in 1982.

With the added interest in Kansas football, coach Glen Mason said his team has dealt well with the attention.

"I think our team has matured in that avenue," he said. "But I don't put blinders on them. We try to keep them focused. We've talked a lot about taking this program to another level. It's not just winning games, but it's dealing with the hype and attention."

Mason said one of the primary reasons for playing California was for the exposure. The Jayhawks played the Golden Bears after beating Tulsa the previous Saturday, giving Kansas only three days of practice to prepare.

"True, we needed the exposure, but I thought we needed the learning experience of that type of hype," Mason said. "Normally, once you go through it, it's not as big of deal as you once thought."

Spikers to play OU with new confidence

BRIAN ANDERSON

Collegian

Coach Patti Hagemeyer and her volleyball team go south of the state line this weekend for contests between the 11-11 Oklahoma Sooners and the 0-19 Tulsa Hurricanes.

"We've worked on our confidence and pride," Hagemeyer said. "I'm making them have pride wearing a K-State jersey and making them believe this is going to be a good program."

Hagemeyer said the Cats battled in their last match against Wichita State Tuesday night before losing in three games.

"In the first game, the score was 10-10, and I thought we had control and momentum at that point of the match," Hagemeyer said. "We committed a couple of errors and weren't able to come back."

The Shockers won 15-10, 15-4 and 15-8, dropping K-State's record to 6-18.

Kathy Saxton became K-State's all-time single-season attack leader Tuesday. Her 32 attacks moved her past Donna Lee's record of 1,076 attacks. Going into Saturday's match against the Sooners, Saxton has 1,082 attacks.

Saxton needs four more kills to top the single-season kill record held by Lee. Lee had 451 kills in 1985.

Oklahoma beat K-State Oct. 10 in three games 15-7, 15-14 and 15-8. The bigger Sooners had 52 kills in the last match.

"We have the same athletic ability as they do," Hagemeyer said. "We are not intimidated by their size."

Oklahoma has eight players six-feet tall or taller with its shortest spiker at 5-foot-8 inches.

The Sooners are in the hunt to make the Big Eight Volleyball Tournament. Their record in the conference is 4-4, and they are in fourth place.

After the match in Norman, Okla., K-State travels east to Tulsa to play the Hurricanes, who are still looking for their first win of the season. K-State has a 20-1 record against Tulsa.

"We have a chance to win," Hagemeyer said. "We have to play hard to get that one."

Pirates' Lind captures 1st Gold Glove Award

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — For all the line drives and popups Jose Lind caught this year with his Gold Glove, they'll never make up for the grounder that got away.

Lind's error on a bouncer by David Justice was just the break the Atlanta Braves needed in the playoffs last month, and they turned the mistake into a three-run rally in the ninth inning to beat Pittsburgh 3-2 in Game 7.

On Thursday, Lind was presented with his first-ever Rawlings Gold Glove, ending a streak of nine straight wins by Ryne Sandberg of the Chicago Cubs as the NL's best-fielding second baseman.

As happy as Lind was, the award could not compensate for the one error that could have cost the Pirates a chance to reach the World Series.

"No, not at all," Lind said. "I just tried to catch that ball, and I didn't. There's nothing you can do about it now."

Lind led National League second basemen with a .992 fielding percentage this season, making only six errors in 745 chances. But he made two errors in the playoffs, including the big one in the final game.

"It's awfully easy to pick out one guy, like Bill Buckner," said Andy Van Slyke, Lind's teammate and a fellow Gold Glove winner. "But we win and lose as a unit. We could've had a 4-0 lead, and it wouldn't have made a difference."

Van Slyke won his fifth straight Glove and was joined in the outfield by Pittsburgh's Barry Bonds.

Other NL winners were Cubs first baseman Mark Grace, St. Louis shortstop Ozzie Smith, Atlanta third baseman Terry Pendleton, Montreal outfielder Larry Walker, St. Louis catcher Tom Pagnozzi and Cubs pitcher Greg Maddux.

The AL winners were Yankees first baseman Don Mattingly, Toronto second baseman Roberto Alomar, Baltimore shortstop Cal Ripken, Chicago third baseman Robin Ventura, Texas catcher Ivan Rodriguez, California pitcher Mark Langston and outfielders Ken Griffey Jr. of Seattle, Kirby Puckett of Minnesota and Devon White of Toronto.

Smith's award was announced last month before he joined a Japanese tour by major league all-stars. Smith has won 13 straight Gold Gloves, the most in NL history. Brooks Robinson and Jim Kaat have won 16 each.

Mattingly won his seventh Gold Glove, and Puckett earned his sixth. White, whose catch against the center field fence started a near-triple play in the World Series, won his fourth. Pendleton's award was the first for an Atlanta player since Dale Murphy in 1985.

Rodriguez, at age 20, won in his first full season in the majors. He is the second-youngest winner ever, only a week older than when Cincinnati catcher Johnny Bench won in 1968.

Rodriguez threw out 48.6 percent of opposing basestealers, far better than the major league average of 33 percent. Rodriguez did it despite handling a staff of pitchers that is wild.

THE LINE: Nebraska by 14.

ABOUT THE JAYHAWKS: No. 12 Kansas' fullback Monte Cozzens has consecutive 100-yard rushing games. But that streak is over. Cozzens had arthroscopic surgery on his knee Tuesday and probably won't return until KU's final game of the season. He was the team's second-leading rusher with 527 yards. The brunt of the rushing duties now belong to tailback Maurice Douglas. He leads the team in rushing with 554 yards and is averaging 4.4 yards a carry. Last week's lackadaisical 26-18 victory against the Cowboys sparked some concerns for this week's clash.

ABOUT THE HUSKERS: No. 7 Nebraska's lopsided 52-7 win over Colorado a week ago proved, once again, the Husker dominance at home. Nebraska has lost just two Big Eight home games since 1987. The Huskers have the No. 1 rushing team in the nation, averaging 351.1 rushing yards a game. Backs Calvin Jones and Derek Brown have been averaging a combined total of 208 yards a game.

THE SKINNY: Who would have thought the Jayhawks would be playing a game that would put them in the driver's seat of the vehicle to the Orange Bowl? This is that game. It's so important, in fact, that ESPN asked the two clubs to move the starting time back to accommodate the network's starting slot. The Hawks haven't beaten Nebraska since 1968, and Nebraska is riding an emotionally powerful victory over Colorado. The Jayhawks have been having a Cinderella season. But against Nebraska, the glass slipper just won't fit.

OKLAHOMA ST. at COLORADO

FAST FACTS: 1:10 p.m., Folsom Field, Boulder, Colo.

RECORDS: Oklahoma State (4-4, 2-2) and Colorado (6-1-1, 2-1-1).

THE LINE: Colorado by 19 1/2.

ABOUT THE COWBOYS: Oklahoma State gave the Jayhawks a tough battle last week before falling 26-18 in the final quarter. The Cowboys had more total yards than Kansas, outgaining the division leaders 403-341. Oklahoma State gained 259 yards through the air.

ABOUT THE BUFFALOES: The No. 16 Buffaloes were routed by the Cornhuskers on national television last week. Freshman quarterback Koy Detmer, who started for the injured Kordell Stewart, tossed three interceptions. But the Buffs still lead the conference in passing offense, averaging nearly 310 yards a game. And the 87.4 yards Colorado is giving up through the air also leads the Big Eight. The receiving duo of Michael Westbrook and Charles Johnson are each averaging more than 100 yards a game. Between the two of them, they have 1,649 receiving yards.

THE SKINNY: Last week's loss broke Colorado's 25-game unbeaten conference streak. The Buffaloes are mad — hungry and mad. Saturday, the Cowboys will find out just how much.

MISSOURI at OKLAHOMA

FAST FACTS: 1 p.m., Memorial Stadium, Norman, Okla.

RECORDS: Missouri (1-7, 0-4) and Oklahoma (4-3-1, 2-1-1).

THE LINE: Oklahoma by 12.

ABOUT THE TIGERS: Missouri is hard to figure out. The Tigers gave both Colorado (6-0) and Nebraska (34-24) good games this season. But then last week, Missouri lost to Iowa State, a team who had been mired in a four-game losing streak. The Tiger running game continues to slump. As a team, Missouri is averaging 2.85 yards a rush.

ABOUT THE SOONERS: Oklahoma survived a scare from K-State last week. Junior Aubrey Beavers is tied with Colorado's Ron Woolfork with 10.5 sacks. He will have plenty of chances to increase that total against the pass-oriented Tigers. Junior quarterback Cale Gundy has thrown for 1,548 yards so far this season.

THE SKINNY: Missouri has lost nine straight road games. And although the Sooners aren't quite the same dominant Sooners of years gone by, look for Oklahoma to extend Missouri's road woes to 10.

AWARDS

STATE

Freshman awarded grant

BILL SPIEGEL
Collegian

One student's dedication to the horse-racing industry recently paid off.

Scott Blasi, freshman in pre-veterinary medicine, won a $1,000 scholarship renewable for up to four years from the American Quarterhorse Foundation.

The scholarship is based on the applicant's choice of a career that will benefit the horse-racing industry, said Dina Austin, racing education assistant for the AQHF, which is a branch of the American Quarterhorse Association.

Academic achievements were also a consideration when awarding the scholarship, Austin said.

"It was a nice surprise. It will be a big help," said Blasi, who said he had to include in the application a short essay explaining how he could benefit the racing industry.

In order to keep the scholarship for four years, Blasi said he must maintain a 2.5 cumulative grade point average.

Blasi attributed winning the scholarship to his involvement in the quarterhorse-racing industry.

He grew up on a successful quarterhorse racing farm and has become acquainted with people in the industry.

"Working and knowing guys in the industry definitely helped me win," he said.

In a letter of recommendation for the scholarship, David Tolle, Kansas American Quarter Horse Association director, said, "Scott Blasi is a young man the Racing Council and the AQHA can count on."

Austin said the scholarship is relatively new.

"The Racing Council was formed in 1986, and we started the scholarship program shortly after that," she said.

The AQHF chooses the recipients of the award. She said 14 students showed an interest in receiving the award this year.

There are four students whose scholarships are being renewed, and six new awards were given out this year.

"The program is very new, and funds are limited. We grant as many scholarships as we can afford," Austin said.

Blasi said nearly all the money will go to school expenses.

"A little of it will go to fun, but it will all pretty much go to school," Blasi said.

"It felt really good to get it. There isn't any better feeling than winning $1,000."

Finney approves information release

List of legislators belonging to pension plan disclosed

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Gov. Joan Finney said Thursday she approved the release on the eve of Election Day of names of legislators who belong to a special pension plan they enacted for themselves in 1988.

Her instructions to the Division of Accounts and Reports in the Department of Administration came after Attorney General Bob Stephan told the agency in a letter, not in a legal opinion, he thought payroll information should be released under the Open Records Act.

Reporters used information on how much the state was contributing to the legislators' pension accounts to determine which ones had joined the enhanced plan. They identified 93 present and former members who belong.

Disclosure of the names was timely, because of a continuing controversy over creation of the enhanced pension plan for elected officials and legislators. The plan provided them better retirement benefits than other members of the state pension program receive.

The plan was rescinded in the 1991 session, and legislators were placed back in the regular Kansas Public Employees Retirement System plan effective next January. But those who were members of the enhanced plan while it was in effect will draw the enhanced benefits for that four-year period.

Finney's disclosure that she got involved in the decision to release the information came as the Kansas Public Employee Retirement Study Commission met at the Statehouse and heard the Legislature's top lawyer say he felt disclosure of the payroll information was improper under state law.

State statutes reviser Norman Furse, whose office drafts bills for the Legislature, said a 1974 state law classifies such information as confidential and prohibits its disclosure.

However, Stephan said payroll information must be public under the Open Records Act. He did not consider the law cited by Furse in offering his opinion that the payroll information should be released.

'League' good enough to see again and again

■ "A League of Their Own" will play at 7 and 9:30 tonight and Saturday, and at 7 p.m. Sunday in Forum Hall.

ANDY WOODWARD
Collegian

One would be hard pressed to find a reason not to like "A League of Their Own."

Directed by Penny Marshall, who also directed "Big," the film is a based on the short-lived All American Girl's Professional Baseball League. The plot revolves around the league's conception, evolution and demise.

Tom Hanks delivers a hilarious portrayal of Jimmy Dugan, a rummy who used to play in the big leagues and is offered a chance for redemption by coaching a new women's team. This is one of Hanks' funnier roles.

REVIEW

Also starring is Geena Davis as Dottie Henson, the team's catcher. Davis is very solid and commanding (as usual) as the nucleus of the insecure rookies. Her strong screen presence and domineering physical build controls her scenes.

Madonna is surprisingly not annoying as Meg, the worldly leftfielder. She doesn't posture, and she doesn't strut. Madonna doesn't play Madonna playing whatever character she's supposed to be, as she's done in all her other film escapades. She's quite good, and she blends seamlessly into her place.

Jon Lovitz is quite amusing as the agent who travels across the countryside trying to recruit non-professional women players to play in the big leagues. The only drawback is that he plays a supporting role. So, he isn't on screen for more than 20 minutes.

The Professional Girl's Baseball League existed from the early 1940s to the late 1950s.

And, consequently, one of the endearing aspects of the movie is that you know the league is doomed for failure before it even starts. You have sympathy for the characters almost before you know them, which keeps you interested.

The only thing I found wrong with the movie is a lot of editing slipups that only a die-hard baseball fan will catch. A batter will hit a line drive to second base, and the leftfielder will end up catching deep flyball.

This is the type of movie you'll see on HBO in a couple of years, and you'll watch it every time it's on, no matter when you start watching it.

Oh, bloody hell

Anyone wondering how long it would take Tina Brown to destroy the credibility of the New Yorker, please pay attention.

Brown, former chief at Vanity Fair, is embroiled in a three-way, tag-team, all-British Royal Battle involving Brown, her husband, Harold Evans, and spy novelist John Le Carré.

Basically, Evans was unflatteringly portrayed in a new biography of media baron Rupert Murdoch. Brown's New Yorker then ran a stinging piece attacking the book, that was followed by Le Carré writing a letter to the magazine, accusing Brown of shielding her hubby.

Brown, who sold copies of Vanity Fair by putting a naked Demi Moore on the cover, is miffed.

Someone get these people some tea.

Of course, Tito will want to hog the entire screen again

Don't fool yourself, you knew it was coming. This month ABC will give us good reason to find new time-consuming hobbies when they present "The Jacksons: An American Dream."

This four-hour miniseries stars Billy Dee Williams as Motown founder Berry Gordy, Vanessa Williams as singer Suzanne de Passe, and Boyz II Men in a cameo role as a doo-wop group.

The Jackson 5 — Marlon, Jermaine, Jackie, Tito and, of course, Michael — are portrayed by three different actors each during three different stages of their lives, according to the press release.

This proves that 'Sesame Street' really was educational Remember when Bartlett's Familiar Quotations was a hallowed tome, filled with the pithy words of history's most brilliant people?

Could someone explain, then, why the newest edition would shorten the passages of Emerson and include such profound quotes as "Me want cookie!" by Cookie Monster or a few lyrics of the Rolling Stones' "Satisfaction."

In the case of the lyrics, Bartlett's can't even get those right. Hey, it's not "I can't get no satisfaction/I can't get no girl with action."

It's "I can't get no girl reaction."

Hey, guys! We're all up here on the bandwagon! Jump on!

Lets take a bleak look at the latest in crass merchandising from the world of cartoons.

New out on the stands is "Ren & Stimpy Exposed" magazine filled with shameless huckster advertisements for Ren & Stimpy watches & bedsheets, "Beverly Hills 90210" action figure dolls ("They're authentically cool, in the trendiest fashions!"), and Kit Kat candy bars.

Besides the ads, the magazine also includes an interview with R&S creator John Kricfalusi, an interview with Stimpy voiced Billy West, a story on some dumb kid who inspired an episode, and a fold-out poster.

That said, we pose a question to all "Ren & Stimpy" merchandise owners out there — Do you have to utterly destroy the integrity of every original idea that happens to cross your path?

Weekend begs you — let good things be.

TRUCK STOP LOVE

waiting for the Big Show

A Four young men in a small white house on 10th Street are waiting. They are waiting on a journalist who is more than a half hour late.

S They are also waiting for the DJ on the radio to play a song off the new tape they gave him. The DJ promised to "get it right on." They turn the remote-controlled stereo from a Band X album on the phonograph to the radio station every two minutes.

T These four young men are also waiting for the Big Show on Monday. They are in a band named Truck Stop Love, which is three words, not two.

O The Big Show, that which is South by Southwest, is a big hoedown in Austin, Texas, that has more people on the guest list than actual people buying tickets. That is to say, there are more record representatives looking for the next Big Thing than there are fans. This could be the four young men's Big Chance.

R When the journalist makes it to the small white house on 10th Street, he is 40 minutes late, but the four young men offer the journalist a beer anyway. He takes it.

O One of the four young men changes from the album to the radio again.

R "So," the journalist says settling in uncomfortably, "Are you guys excited about Monday?"

U Monday being, of course, the big South by Southwest playoff in Lawrence at the Bottleneck. The band half expects to lose.

N The band is up against four other bands from, where else? Lawrence. The answer is "yes." They are excited. Not that excited, though, they say, keeping their heads about themselves.

E Which is something new, the journalist notices. In a previous interview, the four young men seemed cocky, big for their breeches.

S "You seem to have changed a little," the journalist opines.

P The bassist, a tall-guy, movie-star type, wears a yellow stocking cap and a flannel shirt to keep out the cold. He smiles at the journalist's comments.

H "We're not bitter drunks anymore," he says. It rolls from there.

O The lanky blond guitarist with John Lennon glasses pipes up.

BY "We're discovering our roots in country music," he says, deadpan, perhaps seriously.

L The drummer grimaces. He is trying very hard to project a Positive Image to the Press and the journalist.

E "We play rock 'n' roll," he corrects. "Rock 'n' roll is the shit."

W The journalist himself grimaces at that. He has promised his adviser, his fiancée and the Kansas Livestock Association that he will try to stop writing bad words in his rock 'n' roll stories. It is too late, however.

Y "This band is totally self-sufficient," the drummer continues. "We have our own transportation — the bus. We have our own equipment. We have a tape, a good tape."

A They also have songs, three of the four young men say. The long-hair vocalist is unusually quiet this night. The new songs, the drummer says, are all their own. The lanky blond guitarist says they have gone from being the new kids on the block to the premier band in Manhattan.

"It's hard to think that we used to sit around waiting for Roach Factory to call us to open for them," the guitarist says. "We're not playing for a crowd of four people anymore."

Something in his voice sounds like he regrets that. "Don't you want to be big?" the journalist asks.

The guitarist stops, thinks. "We're content," he says.

"We're not out to be Big Local Heroes," the bassist says.

There is an air of underlying anxiety now. Then the guitarist lets it out.

"We'd rather play for ourselves," the guitarist says. "But I'll tell you, it's an injustice. It's an injustice that a Lawrence cover band can come into this town and get paid $1,000, and we can barely make 50 bucks."

And then, the drummer says, there's the injustice of knowing everyone in this here small college town.

"I'll give you an example," he says, leaning forward on the couch. "This girl came into the record store where I work, and we were playing the Moving Van Goghs. And she asks me, 'Who is this?' And I tell her it's the Moving Van Goghs. And she says, 'I didn't know they were a real band.'"

"That's how it is with us," the drummer says. "And I'm like, 'Just because you know us doesn't mean we're no good.'"

The four young men listening alternately to the radio broadcast and the phonograph are good for being together for a little more than a year. Quite good, actually.

The bassist says to turn the radio back on.

And there it is. Their song. On the radio.

There are sly smiles. The drummer air-drums parts of his parts. The guitarist says it sounds good.

The end comes. "Listen to this," the drummer says, followed by the recorded wailing guitar of the blond guitarist that fades out on the airwaves. Then there's another guitar riff that's all-too-familiar.

It's one of the cover bands that will be in the competition Monday. It's their song. On the radio.

The four young men listen without trying to. They keep talking to the journalist.

The band has changed, they say. The guitarist says they take themselves less seriously than they once did. The drummer says they are closer to reality. Then the guitarist says something somewhat unexpected by the journalist.

"There's not a day that doesn't go by that I don't think about quitting," he says. "But at the same time, I wouldn't trade the feeling for anything."

"Not me," the drummer says. "I want Truck Stop Love dolls. I want Truck Stop Love trading cards ..."

"... I won't be here in 30 years," the guitarist says. "I won't be here when I'm 30 ..."

The drummer hasn't stopped. "... I want Truck Stop Love lunchboxes. I want to be on MTV with my pants off, offending the whole damn world."

The bassist turns to the journalist, as he has several times during the night. "This interview has sort of digressed, hasn't it?" he says. "This is how it is: We won't be here, in this town, in a year. If we're not dead, we won't be here. So just tell people to come see us."

Welcome to prime time TV programming in Havana

ASSOCIATED PRESS

HAVANA — Cuban residents gathering around the TV set every weekend evening for the beginning of the day's state-controlled programming.

But it's not a favorite Spanish-language soap opera or the evening news they're anxious to see. They want to know when the government is going to turn their lights off.

At 6 p.m. every weekday, after the playing of the Cuban national anthem, a woman's voice comes on the air to announce the schedule for government-ordered brownouts designed to conserve the country's dwindling petroleum supply. Daily brownouts of three to four hours — except on Sunday — are commonplace in Havana neighborhoods these days.

Afterward, a government official may come on to announce changes in the week's gasoline rationing schedule or in the availability of meat in government food stores.

This is prime time in Havana. Unlike their Yanqui neighbors to the west, Cubans receive just two TV stations, Cubavision and Tele Rebelde, both tightly controlled by the government.

Like the brownout and rationing announcements, the government is using television more than before to get important information to its citizens.

On the "Hoy Mismo (Today)" news program, for example, a young man tells viewers how to kill cockroaches using a mixture of boric acid and sugar.

This may sound absurd to someone who doesn't know that bug spray cannot be purchased in Cuba. Luxury items such as roach traps and flea bombs never reach these Caribbean shores because of the country's limited trade.

News about the United States is decidedly negative, focusing on such things as crack babies in New York or the abuses of apartment owners in Chicago.

But it's not all propaganda. Cubans get some entertainment programming.

For the kids, there are a few cartoons. Grown-ups have their choice of two serial soap operas — the Cuban-made "El naranjo del patio (The Orange Tree on the Patio)" and the Brazilian "Vale Tudo (Worth Everything)," dubbed into Spanish from the original Portuguese.

Leaders needed, speaker says

"I can't think of a single field that doesn't need leaders. Certain fields, like medicine, need it more than others," Bradley said. People in the medical profession are not given training that focuses on leadership, he said. Scott Truhlar, senior in pre-medicine, physical science and social science, asked, "Where does medicine allow you to have leadership?" Bradley said organizing an AIDS-awareness project was one non-traditional leadership role that came up at his hospital. And Bradley said there are more common ways to assume leadership, like being the hospital staff president. Bradley gave the audience of about 40 people his blueprint for leadership. He cited nine steps in the process of working toward a goal. Taking initiative and communicating are the most important steps, he said. "Taking initiative is like an enzyme," Bradley said. "It's the catalyst. If you just stand by and watch the situation flounder, you're not being a leader." Communication, including the often-overlooked nonverbal communication, is the key to all leadership skills, he said. Having a goal in mind is the first step to accomplishing a project, he said. "I read the saying 'Begin with an end in mind.' It's important to know what you want to accomplish," Bradley said. "You should never be embarrassed to ask questions. Learn from the mistakes of others. I won't live long enough to make all the mistakes myself, although sometimes it seems like it," he said. Other steps involve gathering and organizing information, delegating responsibility, teamwork, implementing the plan, and evaluating and documenting the results. "The bottom line is, did you get the job done? Sometimes your plan works. Sometimes it doesn't," Bradley said. "You need to document what you did and what worked. "Otherwise, you're rediscovering the wheel, and you don't get anywhere very fast doing that." Idia Rodriguez, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine, said, "It's a topic that's always been talked about, but I left with a good feeling, like it was possible to achieve something."

Brownback says leaders need goals opportunities. Students should set long-term goals rather than focusing on what they will be doing within five or 10 years after graduation, he said. A strong set of values is also important to leaders, Brownback said. "You have to know what you believe in and what you stand for," he said. "I'm asked nearly every day to bend from my core values just a little. If you start doing that, pretty soon you lose sight of your own values and find that where you're at really doesn't represent your core values." Brownback spent time after his presentation discussing agricultural issues. He said students need to pay attention to both foreign and domestic issues and to become more aware of how foreign countries perceive the issues.

Hidden missiles in Iraq, U.N. says with dismantling Iraq's weapons of mass destruction, said 151 ballistic missiles have been destroyed or are awaiting destruction by the inspectors or the Iraqis. But since the Iraqis have still not come clean on what they have, U.N. officials believe Saddam still has about 100 missiles hidden away. The CIA believes the figure is closer to 200. In March 1991, Iraq admitted it had 52 ballistic missiles. But under intense diplomatic pressure, Baghdad later confessed it had another 92. U.N. inspectors believe at least 487 of the Soviet Scuds were fired during the Iran-Iraq war or in tests. It's not known how many Scuds were provided by Syria, Libya or North Korea, or how many were cannibalized to produce the al-Hussein and al-Abbas variants. During last year's Gulf War, 93 missiles were fired at Israel and Saudi Arabia. The Pentagon concedes no missiles were destroyed in allied air strikes. The Western operatives, based in Amman to monitor Iraq, said Saddam can't bury his missiles because they would deteriorate and become useless. One source said Saddam has to constantly keep the missiles on the move on disguised trucks so inspectors who get tipped off to a particular location can't find them. Travelers from Iraq, including an aerodynamics specialist who said he worked on Saddam's weapons program before the Gulf War, said the Iraqis have buried large numbers of rocket boosters. An unknown number are under the Habaniyah air base in the desert west of Baghdad, as well as in the basements of mosques — at least one in central Baghdad — hospitals and other buildings the Iraqis don't believe the U.N. inspectors will investigate, the specialist said.

Reader may have AIDS and doesn't 'owe' anyone

DEAR CASSANDRA, I have a slight problem. Maybe you can help me. I am a non-traditional freshman. I had been going out with this girl for two years, and a couple weeks ago, she quit returning my phone calls. A week ago, she broke up with me. I kind of felt sorry for myself. So, I went out and had unprotected sex with three girls during the last weekend. This is where my problem comes into play. I recently found out that an old girlfriend died of AIDS. I got a test from my family doctor. I am pretty sure the results will be positive. I feel I don't owe my ex-girlfriend anything. As for these other girls, I don't even remember what their names were. Why do I feel this way? What should I do? Owing Nothing

DEAR OWING NOTHING, AIDS is not something you can only be "pretty sure" about. Go see that family doctor immediately to discuss the results and schedule a second test to be sure of the results. If the results are negative, you will still need to periodically test to make sure you do not have the virus. It is imperative you make every attempt to find ALL the women you have had sexual contact with since your last contact with the girl who died of AIDS. The health consequences alone of failing to do so are enormous, not to mention the legal ramifications of failing to tell these people of your exposure. Since you obviously do not believe you owe these women the consideration of telling them they may have been exposed, then look at it this way: If you do not care about them, then do it for someone you do care about, like your brother or sister, or even your mother or father. Your failure to help stop the virus now, at this time and place, may cause the unnecessary death of someone you love dearly. Can you take that risk?

DEAR CASSANDRA, I have to wonder how we bicyclists are to respect the right of pedestrians to use the sidewalks. On my way from class at 10:30 a.m. Monday, I had to swerve out of the bike lane in front of Anderson Hall to avoid hitting an assistant dean. It would seem that he, of all people, should be setting the example for the other students to follow. I am not criticizing him, but I have noticed a double standard that exists in the week I have had a bike. If we are to coexist on this campus happily, we need to respect each other as pedestrians and bicyclists. Because you are walking down the street not paying attention to what goes on around you and get startled by a passing rider does not mean that the bicyclist was riding dangerously. You need to also heighten your awareness of your surroundings. If you cross a street, even in a crosswalk, you normally look both ways to make sure you won't end up road pizza. Just because bikes don't weigh 1,000 pounds doesn't mean you can ignore them. There is no reason bike riders and pedestrians can't coexist on the sidewalks. Many of them are plenty wide and fully capable of having a bike lane added. Why doesn't our campus try to do something about this? I think this question was answered last Friday when there were campus parking patrol officers on the sidewalks. Why would the University want to give up on another source of revenue? What is there we can do to make our campus spend money on adding bike lanes to some of the wider sidewalks throughout campus instead of finding more efficient ways of making money off students? An example is the new computerized tickets. How do we get our voice heard by the people that see us as dollar signs and not as people? How do we respect the rights of pedestrians on sidewalks when we can't respect bikers' bike lanes? Concerned Biker

DEAR CONCERNED BIKER, Student Senate, I believe, is already attempting to address some of the issues of pedestrian traffic and bicycles. This is where you need to concentrate your efforts to affect a change. I agree that the key is "respect," and that, as always, is a "two-way street" (pardon the pun). ECONOMY

Increase in productivity, sales shows U.S. growth

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The number of first-time claims for unemployment insurance fell in late October to the lowest level in more than two years, and Americans' productivity improved in the third quarter, the government said Thursday.

Separately, many major retail chains reported sales increases last month, raising hopes of storeowners for the first good Christmas season since 1988.

Economists were encouraged by the positive news but cautioned that economic growth, while showing signs of improvement, will not take off anytime soon.

"The economy is beginning to grow more rapidly, but we still won't have the kind of recovery that has followed past recessions," said economist Bruce Steinberg of Merrill Lynch in New York. "Under those conditions, it's going to take a while to get the unemployment rate down."

New claims for unemployment benefits in the week ended Oct. 24 totaled 360,000, down from 376,000 the week before, the Labor Department said. It was the lowest level since the week ended Aug. 4, 1990, soon after the recession began.

A less volatile four-week moving average of claims, at 371,500, also was at a two-year low.

Economists said declining benefit claims are a definite sign of an improving labor market.

But they cautioned the reduction might not translate immediately into a reduction in the unemployment rate, which was 7.5 percent in September, down from an eight-year high of 7.8 percent in June.

"The layoffs are stopping, but outright hiring is not really going on," said economist Elliott Platt of Donaldson, Lufkin & Jenrette in New York. "The outlook is just too uncertain right now for businessmen to take on new employees."

The Labor Department is scheduled on Friday to report the unemployment rate for October and the growth, if any, in the nation's payrolls.

In advance, analysts predicted an unchanged jobless rate, but a small increase of around 25,000 jobs.

In Thursday's report on productivity, the department said output per hour of work increased at a 2.6-percent annual rate during the July-September quarter.

It was the sixth straight quarter that productivity advanced — the best in six months. It had risen 1.7 percent in the second quarter.

If the trend continues, it would foster sustainable economic growth, but economists said the most recent increases appear to be the result of the lackluster economy and employers' desire to wring more work from their existing staff, rather than hire additional people.

'Avengers' win wriggly wrestling

J. KYLE WYATT/Collegian

Jim "Jiffy" Davis, sophomore in chemical engineering, prepares to pounce on Blake "Bonecrusher" Kaus, senior in marketing, during the first round of Jell-O-Rama I Friday night in Weber Arena. Kaus and partner Chris "The Hippo" Hupe won the wrestling competition.

Not many professors took the dare to tackle students in a tag-team Jell-O wrestling competition Friday night in Weber Arena.

"The teachers' response was really bad. I admire the two who participated. I think some teachers were worried about their public image," said Julie Buzby, junior in animal sciences and industry.

David Grieger and Randel Raub, assistant professors of animal sciences and industry, were the only faculty to participate. The rest were graduate teaching assistants, she said. "We gotta worry about tenure," Raub joked. "I guess I signed up in a moment of weakness."

Buzby said she thought of Jell-O-Rama I as a fund raiser for three groups she belongs to — Alpha Zeta, Horseman's Association and Mortar Board.

"It's not your regular cake sale. But it would have been easier for me to just get a job, work a thousand hours and just donate the money," she said.

Two female teams performed an exhibition match, while 14 male teams competed for the trophy. Referees, judges and about 170 spectators witnessed the event.

"We were planning on only having guys because they were the only ones who were applying," said Kim Kirk, senior in English and Mortar Board member.

Grieger appeared ring-side in a gray sweatshirt with padded muscles, a fake fur coat, blue underwear on the outside of his leggings and cowboy boots and hat.

Raub's costume was similar, although his padding was added around his waist.

The assistant professors won their first match against who Raub called, "that little weenie Shawn Potts" and Chad Brown, both seniors in animal sciences and industry.

It was a sweet victory for the professors, who were threatened with disqualification for wrestling with the referees, having all four competitors in the ring at once and squirting a can of whipped cream on Raub's head.

They later dropped out. "We were freezing," Raub explained.

Wrestler Tammy Shearer, senior in accounting and Mortar Board president, said, "I thought this was Jell-O. So how come it's gritty in my mouth?"

One of the women's tactics was to grab each other's arms and spin around until they fell.

"The girls should have gotten meaner," said Denise Jacobs, sophomore in secondary education.

The two trophies were awarded to Chris Hupe, senior in finance, and Blake Kaus, senior in marketing.

Rebels set off bombs across Colombia

At least 9 people killed; state of emergency declared

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOGOTA, Colombia — President Cesar Gaviria declared a national state of emergency Sunday after leftist rebels detonated more than 30 bombs across Colombia.

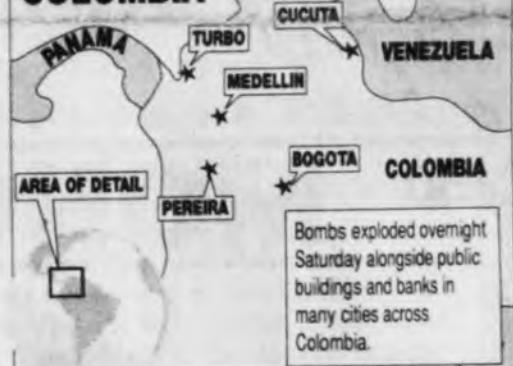

At least nine people were killed and 60 wounded.

Gaviria made the announcement after calling an emergency Security Council meeting with his Cabinet Sunday morning to discuss measures to combat Colombia's 35-year-old rebel insurgency.

The state of emergency will be in force for 90 days. During that period the government will assume extraordinary powers: Gaviria will be able to order actions against rebels without consulting Congress or the courts.

Presidential spokeswoman Daisy Canon, who made the announcement of the state of emergency, said Gaviria will go on national radio and television at about 7:30 p.m. to further discuss the scope of the action.

BOMB BLASTS KILL 9 IN COLOMBIA

MIKE WELCH/Collegian

Before the top-level meeting, Gaviria's interior minister, Humberto de la Calle Lombana, said the guerrilla attacks were unprecedented and called for a state of emergency.

Earlier Sunday, the president said, "It's now the hour to confront, without truces — in the military, judicial and legislative fields, and with the support of citizens — those who have become the worst criminals of the country."

The blasts, and other terrorist attacks, came a day after Gaviria went on national television and denounced Colombia's rebels.

Leftist rebels of the Simon Bolivar Guerrilla Coordinator movement began an offensive Saturday, killing 26 policemen who were protecting drills at a petroleum field in southern Colombia.

Drug dealers have also targeted police. They have killed 20 officers in the past 10 days in retaliation for the death of Brances Muoz Mosquera, the security chief for Pablo Escobar Gaviria, a fugitive drug trafficker.

Authorities say the Medellin cocaine cartel is paying hired assassins the equivalent of $2,100 for each policeman they kill in Medellin, Escobar's base and Colombia's second largest city after Bogota. Three of the people killed in the overnight attacks in Medellin were police.

NEWS DIGEST

FATAL POLICE BEATING PROTESTED

DETROIT (AP) — About 150 people rallied downtown Sunday, protesting the fatal beating of a man by police officers. A prosecutor said he was pushing for charges against the officers.

Malice Wayne Green, 35, of Detroit was dragged from his car and beaten Thursday night by two officers with a flashlight as five other officers watched or took part, Police Chief Stanley Knox said.

Knox said he couldn't say if race was a factor in the beating. Green was black; police haven't identified the officers, but the Detroit Free Press reported that six were white and one was black.

LEFTISTS DISRUPT RALLY IN BERLIN

BERLIN (AP) — A call to arms against rightist violence inspired 350,000 people to march and rally in the capital Sunday.

But the day was spoiled by radical leftists who threw rocks and eggs at Chancellor Helmut Kohl and President Richard von Weizsaecker. Neither leader appeared to have been struck.

Kohl blamed right- and left-wing "mobs" for disrupting the rally. However, it appeared to have been the work of the far-left anarchist scene, which advocates the dissolution of Germany.

IRAN-CONTRA

Dole calls for prosecution probe

Also suggests President Bush pardon defendants

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Senate Minority Leader Bob Dole on Sunday called for an investigation of Iran-Contra prosecutor Lawrence Walsh.

He also said President Bush should consider pardoning all defendants in the scandal.

Dole called Walsh's office "a Democratic hotbed of Democratic activist lawyers."

A special prosecutor from the Justice Department should be brought in to determine whether politics played a part in a new indictment of ex-Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger, Dole said on CBS's "Face the Nation."

Walsh, a Republican, was deputy attorney general in the Eisenhower administration.

Walsh denied there was political motivation in the second indictment of Weinberger, which disclosed Bush's role in a 1986, meeting about the Reagan administration's arms-for-hostages deals with Iran.

Bush spent the presidential campaign's final days fending off questions about the scandal.

Dole said the Oct. 30 grand-jury charge against Weinberger was obtained by a newly hired Walsh aide, James Brosnahan, who contributed $500 and whose law firm contributed $20,000 to Bill Clinton's campaign.

Dole suggested Clinton's campaign got advance notice from Walsh's office about the new Weinberger charges, because a Clinton-Gore press release responding to the indictment and focusing on Bush was dated Oct. 29 — the day before the indictment.

Clinton aides have said the date was a misprint and that they obtained information for their press release from wire-service accounts after the indictment.

Walsh, in an interview Sunday with the Associated Press, denied that there had been any communication on the new Weinberger charge in advance of the indictment, except for an interagency group of intelligence experts from the Bush administration.

That group reviews all pending indictments in Walsh's Iran-Contra investigation ahead of time for possible classified information.

"That's the only group that had any advance information about the indictment," Walsh said.

The new indictment — based on Weinberger's notes — disclosed then-Vice President Bush participated in a Jan. 7, 1986, discussion of trading 4,000 TOW anti-tank missiles for five American hostages.

Parents' Weekend has a new name

JULIE WHITE
Collegian

Parents' Weekend is a thing of the past.

The tradition of honoring students' parents has now been expanded to include the whole family.

The event will now be called Family Weekend.

The increasing number of non-traditional students caused the name change, said Becky Klingler, director of the KSU Alumni Association.

Klingler said the increasing number of students who come from non-traditional families also factored in making the change.

"Students are supported by not only their parents, but their spouses, children and other family members," Klingler said. "We want to include them, too."

The Alumni Association worked with the Parents Programming

Committee and FENIX on the update.

"It's pretty much a national trend to move toward programming for families," Klingler said.

The weekend's activities will be expanded to include students, children and spouses, as well as parents, Klingler said.

"I think it's a very positive thing that will make everyone at the University feel a part of the weekend," she said.

The activities for next year's weekend are in the planning stages.

Chimes Junior Honorary, which had sponsored Parents' Weekend, will continue to promote it as Family Weekend.

"Chimes is happy with the change in names," said Travis Brock, Chimes president and junior in business administration.

"We're excited to have a part in the change and are ready to do what we can to help out."

Screens boost Jackson show

Opening act appeals to younger audience

KARREY BRITT
Collegian

Seven thousand country fans of all ages packed Bramlage Coliseum Friday night to hear the popular tunes of Diamond Rio and Alan Jackson.

Diamond Rio, the Country Music Association's Group of the Year, opened for Jackson with songs such as "Nowhere Bound," "Mirror, Mirror" and "This State of Mind."

The crowd seemed to favor "Meet in the Middle," which received tremendous whoops and hollers.

After a great crowd response, Diamond Rio went back on stage for the popular song, "Norma Jean Riley," which left the audience going wild.

Diamond Rio, with its upbeat country-rock music, seemed to appeal to younger audience members.

Alan Jackson, however, provided a contrast with his more traditional country songs.

Dressed in Wrangler jeans and a Harley Davidson T-shirt, Jackson had a rough look that took some of his fans by surprise.

His first song, "Chasin' That Neon Rainbow," got the crowd swaying and singing right along with him.

Two video screens were placed above the sides of the stage for a better view and heightened excitement. They showed stage action, the audience and Jackson's videos throughout the concert.

"The video screens helped liven the audience," said Trey Wentling, senior in horticulture. "The screens added more fun to the songs."

This was clear when his CMA Video of the Year, "Midnight in Montgomery," was shown.

Jackson kept the crowd going with his No. 1 singles, such as "Here in the Real World," "I'd Love You All Over Again" and "Love's Got a Hold on You."

He also played songs from his new album "A Lot About Livin' and a Little 'bout Love," such as "She's Got the Rhythm (and I Got the Blues)" and "Up to My Ears in Tears."

When a huge inflated jukebox appeared center stage, Jackson got the audience rocking with his popular "Don't Rock the Jukebox."

The upbeat music of Diamond Rio and Alan Jackson's traditional country songs made the three-hour performance an enjoyable concert.

Opera workshop offered

Students to perform excerpts, not entire show

LANE ALLISON
Collegian

K-State is hooked on opera.

The K-State music and speech departments are sponsoring a fall opera workshop at 8 p.m. Tuesday in All Faiths Chapel.

The workshop's program includes selections from "Die Fledermaus," "Rigoletto" and "The Italian Girl in Algiers."

Jerry Langenkamp, musical director of the workshop and professor of music, said the workshop is part of the regular function of the music department.

He said the purpose of the workshop is to give performance-oriented students the opportunity to learn the style of singing and acting in operas.

"Operas are not written for students," he said. "They don't write easy operas."

"The voices of 18- to 20-year-old students aren't yet mature. We don't ask them to sing an entire two-hour opera," Langenkamp said. "This workshop gives them an opportunity to sing 15 to 20 minutes."

Carl Hinrichs, workshop stage director and associate professor of speech, said students gain knowledge and experience from the workshop.

"The workshop is a sort of class. It's there to provide students an opportunity to work on opera scenes. Students learn more about the techniques of acting in an operatic medium."

"It's more like a concert than a fully produced opera. It's almost like an acting class exercise for opera," he said.

"It's very simply staged. There is not a lot of costuming or scenery."

Langenkamp said the opera workshop and the opera production in the spring have had good support in past years.

"We have a number of non-music as well as music faculty who love opera," Langenkamp said. "There are also many student opera enthusiasts. We generally have good attendance at the workshop."

"There is a variety of singers and music, which makes it more interesting for the audience," he said.

Langenkamp said he thinks the workshop also introduces opera to those at the University with a limited background in it.

"We don't hear opera much, so most people don't get exposed to it much. This workshop is a good opportunity for people to try the water of opera," he said.

THE ISSUE

A number of people tore down the goal posts at the end of the K-State-Iowa State football game.

WE SUGGEST

Fans need to show more respect for the team and its playing field, and not act like children.

Wagner Field's goal posts should be torn down after every game.

No, make that after every completed pass. Or every time we sack the opposing team's quarterback.

Nothing shows the support of and respect for the football team more than tearing down the goal posts.

After all, they aren't expensive. It is easy to replace them.

And of course, they are so soft and pliable it isn't possible for anyone to get injured when they come down.

After what occurred after last week's televised game against Iowa State, it is painfully clear the fans need to learn how to respect their team and its playing field.

We did not beat the No. 1 team in the nation. We beat Iowa State. Granted, it was a well-earned victory, but it was not a victory worthy of tearing down goal posts and ripping the field.

Thursday's game was televised nationwide on ESPN. Thankfully, the nation did not see the behavior of certain fans after the game. However, they did see fans rushing onto the field and climbing the goal posts.

To those who behave like true fans and showed their respect to the team, thank you. Your behavior represented K-State well.

For that childish mob who felt it was necessary to rush onto the field and tear down the posts, wake up and get a grip on financial reality. It may seem fun at the time, but the students pay for the goal posts in the end.

This certainly isn't going to help decrease student athletic fees or the deficit of the athletic department.

If you want to tear down the goal posts, why don't you pay for the new ones, and spare the rest of us the burden.

Better yet, why don't you refrain from going to the game next time if you can't do your cheering without damaging property.

CLINTON-GORE

Efforts of Young Democrats admired

Editor,

This is a public and heartfelt thank you to the many Young Democrats on campus — as well as staff and faculty — who gave a hand in the Riley County Clinton-Gore campaign.

As co-chair of the local campaign, I wanted to say how much I appreciated the incredible energy and hard work of the volunteers who helped spread the Clinton message of "putting people first." Ruth Schrum, my co-chair, joins me in this grateful acknowledgement of the Young Democrats, without whom we could not have accomplished what we did.

So many folks were involved that it would be impossible to name them all in this space. They know who they are, and they should all feel proud. Thank you, all.

I would like to single out one individual whose leadership, organization and efficiency was so critical to the campaign: Young Democrats president Ray Kowalczyk. I probably spoke to Ray every day during the fall phase of the campaign. His tireless dedication and politically incisive-answering-machine greetings always encouraged me, and never ceased to astonish me. Thanks for all the help.

We ran a close, tough campaign here. In this highly Republican area, we came about 500 votes short of winning Riley County for Bill Clinton. We all wanted to see him win here, and we came mighty close. It's a testament to the hard work of the volunteers and to the power of the Clinton-Gore message.

I look at it this way: with the help of the volunteers, we won more than the White House. We won the future.

BRAMLAGE

Fee support should be student priority

Editor,

In the next few weeks, Student Senate will be considering a bill to adjust part of the current $2 Bramlage Coliseum repair and replacement fee by an additional $1. This fee would be used for repair and replacement costs.

I would encourage each and every student to support this fee for several reasons. First, it would help maintain Bramlage, and second, it would free up funds to bring new and exciting acts to Bramlage. Lastly, if we pay now, we will help alleviate future burdens to K-State students, while simultaneously benefiting ourselves. This fee is clearly in the best interests of the students.

SOCIAL ILLS

Letter was gospel on plight of the poor

Editor,

I want to voice my appreciation for the perspective on social justice provided by Dr. Burns in the Letters to the Editor in the Nov. 6 Collegian.

Dr. Burns argues that donating food and clothing to the annual drives are worthy, but do little to address the actual root causes of why people are hungry and cold in the first place. As he indicates, despite our efforts to throw surplus goods at the problem, "The poor will remain poor."

I would go one step further. I, too, would argue that emergency food, clothing and shelter are required as a safety net for those who periodically fall through the cracks. However, when we believe that we are actually addressing the issue with our donations, we stop short of actually addressing the systemic causes of the problem. Clothing drives, soup kitchens, and homeless shelters do not solve problems — they only somewhat soothe them.

We must understand that our donations, however worthy, are a poor substitute for education, community service and political action. Only when we get to the root of the problem can we hope to do something about it.

College: The road to happiness?

Universities are the leading purveyors of modern America's thoughts and values.

"For with much wisdom comes much sorrow; the more knowledge, the more grief."

—King Solomon

Many people came to K-State to get an education that would enable them to find a rewarding job in the future. Hopefully, these may include jobs that are high-paying, interesting or challenging. Others are at K-State in search of a spouse or the ultimate weekend in Aggieville, the cultural mecca of Kansas. Some came because their parents made them.

Regardless of your reasons for attending K-State, the understanding is that you'll be ensuring, or at least working toward, your future happiness.

The University version of the above passage is very different: "For with much wisdom comes much success; the more knowledge, the more gain."

Universities are the leading purveyors of modern America's thoughts and values. The University teaches us that if we get the right education, learn the right skills and amass worldly knowledge, we'll turn out to be well-rounded, successful and happy people.

Ted Turner, owner of the Atlanta Braves and CNN, has lived out the American dream to its fullest. His success is a model for our society. Yet, Turner has made several comments that might inspire us to reconsider our perspective on success. In a Barbara Walters interview, when asked what success was like, he said, "I feel like there is something missing . . . I feel empty." Donald Trump recently echoed Turner's feelings.

I can relate to Turner, because I've experienced similar feelings. In high school, I had the opportunity to travel to Mexico with a youth group. During our visit, we traveled to a small village about one hour outside Monterey. When we arrived, I expected to see miserable, poverty-stricken people. I did see poverty, at a level that most Americans who have never traveled to a third-world country could hardly imagine.

To my surprise, however, I didn't see the misery I expected. The villagers were happy, full of warmth and eager to make our group feel at home. They offered us all Cokes; realizing that Coke was a scarce commodity. In a village whose only source of income was rope, their generosity took on a special significance.

In my mind, this scene didn't seem possible. Everything I had learned while growing up in Johnson County told me these people should be miserable. I knew I was easily better educated than anyone in that village. I knew that my family was probably hundreds of times wealthier than the entire village.

Yet, these poverty-stricken Mexicans were just as, if not more, happy and content than myself. Nearly every town or village we visited during that trip forced me to doubt my perspective on success I had always put faith in.

College can mark an important chapter in one's lifelong journey for answers. This time should be marked by intense searching and questioning. Most of us will spend 40 hours a week working on projects and papers without spending 10 minutes thinking about other priorities. Like learning how to be a good spouse, parent or friend. Then we wonder why our families and relationships fall apart.

Is it not important to take a break from our routine of intellectual gymnastics and consider the foundational values we're basing our lives on?

College teaches us many things, the most important being that wisdom and knowledge lead to success and fulfillment. If you're truly honest with yourself and set down your academic facade, perhaps you'll conclude that you're truly being enlightened. Or perhaps you'll decide you're being led down a hopeless path.

Rugby team beats Springfield

Men's squad takes match with strong 2nd half

STEVE ROCK
Collegian

Though they may not have played the game of their lives, the members of the K-State men's rugby team beat Springfield Saturday afternoon 19-6 at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

"We didn't play too well," loose forward Steve Robke said. "Springfield is probably the worst team in the division."

"But we got the job done, I guess."

Indeed, the Wildcats' record improved to 8-4, including a 3-2 mark in Heart of America league play. K-State is the third-place team in the five-team division.

The Wildcats got off to a slow start against Springfield and were up by just a 5-3 count at halftime. But the team hasn't played in more than two weeks, Robke said, and that might have had a bearing on the team's performance.

"Everybody was a little rusty," he said. "I think it took us a half to work everything out."

"In the first half, we played pretty sloppy. But in the second half, we were more continuous and made less mistakes."

Indeed, the Wildcats scored 14 points in that second half, giving them a lead they would not relinquish. The Cats also held Springfield to just three points.

One individual who had a strong performance, Robke said, was inside center Brad Steinlage. Steinlage connected on a pair of tries, good for 10 points.

But, Steinlage said, the team deserves credit more than he does.

"It was a team effort — I was just the person to get the tries. It wasn't that big of a deal. It could have been anybody," he said.

"I just happened to be the last person to touch the ball in the try zone."

And for Steinlage, the game may have been a bit more competitive than the team had anticipated.

"I didn't know exactly what to expect," he said.

"They surprised us. I think we thought maybe we could handle them a little bit better. But it was a tough game. It was definitely a tough game — a physical game."

"We won — that's all I know."

In an earlier contest, the K-State rugby second-side team, or B team, lost to Topeka 30-0.

"They got smoked," Robke said.

But Robke also said the game has no bearing on the team's record or placing in the Heart of America division.

"They (Topeka) just wanted to play, so we threw together some players."

Lowery field goal lifts Chiefs to victory

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Nick Lowery kicked a 36-yard field goal with 54 seconds remaining Sunday, lifting the Kansas City Chiefs to a 16-14 victory over San Diego.

The Chargers' four-game winning streak was also stopped.

Dave Krieg, slumping recently as the Chiefs have lost two of their last three games, hit three consecutive passes to set up Lowery's kick.

After the Chargers punted to the Kansas City 33 with 3:18 remaining, Krieg moved the Chiefs to midfield, then found Willie Davis for 25 yards to the 25.

Three running plays put the ball on the 18, and Lowery then booted his third field goal of the game and the 300th of his career.

It ruined a comeback engineered by Chargers quarterback Stan Humphries, the AFC offensive player of the month for October.

Humphries, sacked four times in the first half by Derrick Thomas, directed two second-half touchdown drives as the Chargers (4-5) erased a 13-0 deficit.

Humphries hit Derrick Walker with a 14-yard touchdown pass to cap an 80-yard drive with 2:55 left in the third quarter.

He then connected on passes of 40 and 23 yards in a nine-play, 90-yard drive capped by Marion Butts' 1-yard plunge with 13:28 remaining for a 14-13 lead.

Two of Thomas' sacks led directly to points for the Chiefs, now 5-4.

A 47-yard touchdown pass from Humphries to Nate Lewis that would have made it 10-7 was called back for a holding penalty on tackle Broderick Thompson with about 2:45 left in the first half.

Thomas then sacked Humphries on successive plays, forcing a fumble on the second takedown that Leonard Griffin recovered on the Chargers' 22.

Five plays later, Nick Lowery's kicked a 35-yard field goal to give the Chiefs a 13-0 halftime lead.

Thomas beat Harry Swayne's block in the final minutes of the first period, chopped the ball out of Humphries hand and recovered it himself on the San Diego

15. On the first play of the second half, Christian Okoye bulled over from the 2 for a 10-0 lead.

Kansas City, which beat the Chargers 24-10 in its season opener, held the ball for 7:41 on a 13-play drive with its first possession and had a first and goal on the 8.

But a 10-yard holding penalty and a 15-yard penalty on receiver Willie Davis for an illegal block forced the Chiefs to settle for a 3-0 lead on Lowery's 47-yarder.

After Thomas' fourth sack in the second quarter, the Chargers started giving Swayne some extra help on the All Pro outside linebacker, who was coming to the line of scrimmage on passing downs.

TRANSFER CENTER LEAVES CATS

K-State sophomore center Don Richhart has decided to forgo his basketball career to devote more time to his engineering degree, K-State basketball coach Dana Altman said Sunday.

"Don has been concerned that there wasn't enough time to pursue his degree in engineering and play basketball," Altman said. "I understand his decision and wish the best in his academic career."

Richhart transferred from Tahlequah, Okla. The 6-foot-11 inside player averaged 12 points and seven rebounds at Bacone Junior College.

SPIKERS SPLIT WEEKEND MATCHES

The K-State volleyball team split its weekend matches in Oklahoma by losing to the Oklahoma Sooners Saturday night and beating the Tulsa Hurricanes Sunday afternoon.

The split makes the Cats 7-19 overall, 0-9 in the Big Eight.

K-State defeated the Hurricanes in a four-game match with scores of 15-11, 15-6, 8-15 and 15-7. The loss dropped Tulsa to 0-22.

Co-captains Kathy Saxton and Stephanie Liester each led the squad with 16 kills.

Saturday, the 12-12 Sooners beat K-State in Norman in three games — 15-4, 15-9 and 15-5.

The Cats split on the road as they travel to Kansas Wednesday and to Nebraska Nov. 18.

Taylor's career in jeopardy

Giants linebacker ruptures Achilles tendon; season declared over

ASSOCIATED PRESS

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. — Lawrence Taylor's stellar career with the New York Giants appears to be over.

The perennial All-Pro linebacker and NFL career leader in sacks ruptured his right Achilles tendon in the third quarter of Sunday's 27-7 victory over the Green Bay Packers.

The recovery period for such an injury is about four months.

Taylor announced earlier this year that he was retiring at the end of the season.

"It was a complete tear," team physician Dr. Russell Warren said. "We'll perform the surgery early this week."

"I would expect a full recovery in this type of athletic injury. It shouldn't be the reason he does not come back."

Taylor was carted off the field with 1:14 left in the third quarter. He blocked a pass by Green

Bay's Brett Favre and did not get off the turf. Players gathered around Taylor. He was then taken away, to the crowd's chants of "LT."

"He was in a lot of pain," defensive lineman Leonard Marshall said.

"He was screaming and complaining and worried about his leg."

Taylor, playing his 12th season with the Giants, had two tackles, two assists, one sack and two blocked passes against Green Bay.

Giants coach Ray Handley said Taylor "was disappointed he won't be able to play golf on Tuesday."

"I lost sight of Lawrence (on the play). It looked like he was in traffic, and I don't know if anybody fell on him," Handley said.

"He was in a lot of pain. Initially, I heard when Carl (Banks) came off the field, he mentioned what he thought the injury was, or what Lawrence diagnosed himself."

Dr. Warren said it was the first time in the last 10 years that a Giants player had suffered a torn Achilles tendon.

He added that the artificial turf had nothing to do with the injury.

BIG 8
CONFERENCE

NEBRASKA 49 KANSAS 7

LINCOLN, Neb. — The No. 7 Nebraska Cornhuskers brought the No. 13 Kansas Jayhawks back to earth. And they did it convincingly.

But it was the passing game of the Cornhuskers, not the nation's No. 1 running game, that originally gave the Hawks fits. Nebraska quarterback Tommie Frazier hit tight end Gerald Armstrong on a 36-yard pass on the fifth play of the game for Nebraska's first touchdown. On the first play of the second quarter, Frazier found Armstrong again from 11 yards out, giving the Huskers a quick 14-0 lead.

Frazier, a freshman making just his third start, came back with a 46-yard scoring toss to split end Corey Dixon on Nebraska's next possession. Kansas could never recover.

But Nebraska's running game wasn't to be denied.

The Huskers, who extended their streak of 47 straight wins when rushing for 300 yards or more, had 209 yards on the ground by halftime. Running back Derek Brown, who had 105 rushing yards in the first quarter alone, led the charge with 156 yards on just 15 carries. Calvin Jones added 107 yards on 13 carries.

The Jayhawks entered the game with the best rushing defense in the Big Eight, giving up 113 yards per game. But they were no match for the Huskers, who had 351 rushing yards.

COLORADO 28 OKLAHOMA ST. 0

BOULDER, Colo. — Prior to Saturday's contest with Oklahoma State, Buffalo coach Bill McCartney said he hoped to improve in two areas — establishing the running game and eliminating turnovers.

Against the OSU, Colorado did both. Colorado tailback Lamont Warren rushed for 84 yards and two touchdowns, and the Buffaloes finished with 150 rushing yards. That's a lot for a team that was ranked 101st in the nation.

In Colorado's eight previous games, the Buffaloes had given the ball away a total of 34 times. Against the Cowboys, they had just one turnover.

The Cowboys, on the other hand, committed eight turnovers and finished with just 118 total yards.

OKLAHOMA 51 MISSOURI 17

NORMAN, Okla. — The option has returned to the Sooner offense.

With quarterback Cale Gundy injured, Oklahoma relied, once again, on the running game. And it worked.

Three Sooners ran for more than 100 yards, and Oklahoma finished the game with a season-high 435 rushing yards. Earnest Williams led the charge with 157 yards.

Missouri wide receiver Victor Bailey had 10 catches for 146 yards, giving him Tiger records for catches in a season (58), career catches (111) and career yards (1,844).

Missouri's lone win of this season is against Division I-AA Marshall.

Special dogs provide people ears

"I was laying on the bed when the test smoke alarm went off. Angel jumped on my bed, nudged me, licked me and then led me to the nearest exit."

VIRGINIA LANGFORD

LIANA RIESINGER
Collegian

Special assistance dogs are becoming the ears of the hearing impaired. Specifically, hearing dogs, trained by International Hearing Dog Inc. in Henderson, Colo., have gone to about 600 homes since 1979. Peggy Rodrigue, company vice president and placement and travel coordinator, gave a demonstration with her dog, Rocky Mountain High, at CiCo Park Wednesday night. The Riley County 4-H Kennel Club invited Rodrigue and High as guest speaker and dog. "A lot of people in the United States don't know hearing dogs exist," said Dr. John Lyons, Manhattan veterinarian and 4-H Kennel Club Leader. "We're here as a forum for International Hearing Dog Inc." Rodrigue said hearing dogs help the hearing impaired by letting them know when the doorbell and telephone are ringing. And most importantly, they alert owners when a fire alarm sounds. The dog first goes to the source of the noise, then gets the owner and leads him or her to the location of the sound, Rodrigue said. Virginia Langford, Manhattan resident, recently received her hearing dog, Angel. As a test, Rodrigue set off the smoke alarm in Langford's house to show how Angel would react. "I was laying on my bed when the test smoke alarm went off. Angel jumped on my bed, nudged me, licked me and then led me to the nearest exit," Langford said. "The smoke alarm would be no good to me because my hearing is severely impaired, and this is what motivated me to get a Hearing Dog." To qualify for a hearing dog, people must have at least a 65-percent hearing loss and live alone or in a cooperative living situation where the others will not interfere with the dog's duties, Rodrigue said. "It's important that those around a hearing-impaired person do not interfere with the dog and its duties," she said. "Even a stranger petting a hearing dog is not allowed because it takes away the dog's attention and time from its owner." Hearing dogs can be identified by their bright orange vests and leashes. "All hearing dogs come from animal shelters, and 95 percent are mixed breeds," Rodrigue said. The dog-selection process includes testing for intelligence, adaptability and eagerness to please, Rodrigue said. "The kennel holds 30 dogs at a time, and the average dog takes three to six months to train," she said. "The cost of a dog is $3,000 for a lifetime. "If the dog works 10 years, that's $300 a year, which isn't much for the work and companionship they offer." This cost includes dog training and delivery, veterinary care, housing, maintenance and follow-up. Rodrigue said the organization delivers all over the United States and Canada. "I take High everywhere with me — in restaurants, to work, and even on the airplane," she said. "Every state in the nation has laws that protect hearing dogs. All assistance animals have the right to any public place." Dorcas Irwin, Manhattan resident, has had Skippy for three years. "I think the main thing Skippy does for me is make others aware that I don't hear," Irwin said. "He also alerts me to the sounds around the house. "He's fantastic. He's gone on conventions with me, and I take him to the hospital, library and museums." Hearing dogs also learn sign language, Rodrigue said High has a 250-word vocabulary.

THE CATTLE INDUSTRY

Too big may be too much, breeders say

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — For the last 20 years, U.S. cattle raisers have been pumping up their breeds under the theory that bigger is better. Now, they're afraid too big is too much. Breeders at this year's American Royal livestock show say it may be time to slow the industry's trend toward more beef on the hoof. "There's a happy medium, and we may have slipped past that a little bit," said Hop Dickenson, executive vice president of the American Hereford Association. To see how large breeds have become, all it takes is a quick look around the association's photo gallery at the American Royal. A picture of a prize-winning Hereford from 1957 shows a stubby, short-legged cow, only a few sizes larger — although much heavier — than a great Dane. A picture of a recent grand champion shows a winner so large only the noses, foreheads and hats of the owners standing behind are seen poking above the beast's high back. It's not just Herefords, but nearly all cattle breeds, that have been bred to bigness during the last 20 years, Dickenson said. The industry's motto has been "more animal, more meat" — more beef for the buck. "I think the trend is definitely turning toward the other direction," said Robert Hertzog, veterinarian for the American Royal. "We're going to a little smaller, less leggy kind of an animal today." Cattle began to get bigger about 20 to 30 years ago, when exotic European breeds were imported to the United States.

Reader has had some trouble with 'green jeans'

YOU'RE ASKING ME?

by Cassandra Duveaux

DEAR CASSANDRA,

Instead of giving advice on alcohol and sex in every column, please answer this question for me. How do you remove set-in grass stains from jeans? I believe only someone as wise as you can tell me.

Stained Forever

DEAR STAINED FOREVER,

The normal procedure for removing grass stains that have not set, which is usually caused by high heat such as a dryer, is to pre-soak material in cold water for at least 30 minutes and then rinse. Pre-treat with detergent. Then wash, using detergent, hot water and bleach safe for colored fabric. On acetate and colored fabrics, use one part of alcohol to two parts water. For set-in grass stains on jeans (if they are on the knees), take a sharp pair of scissors and cut them off at the knees. Use the top half for shorts and the bottom half as a rag to dry your tears.

DEAR CASSANDRA,

My friends and I have a very serious situation. We live in a residence hall where one individual seems to have a very bad ego problem.

The first problem is this young man, whom we will refer to as Big Bob, believes girls fall at his feet. He sits in class and tells people how that girl wants him, just because she looks at him. Is he egotistic, or what?

The next big problem is he brags about how girls can't get enough of him. The only time he talks to me and my merry band of so-called losers is when we are talking to girls.

He made a comment that the reason I can't get a woman is because

I don't hang out with the right crew. I hear about all these stories about how he gets on these women, but I never see him with one.

What should we do about Big Bob?

H.G., K-State student

DEAR H.G.,

What should you do? Absolutely nothing.

People who have to tell others how important and "big" they are usually do it in an attempt to compensate for the obvious fact that they are not as big and important as they think they are, and everyone knows it.

Ignore Bob and his comments. As long as you let him "yank your chain," he will keep on making his derisive comments.

DEAR CASSANDRA,

After reading the two letters in which men explained the concern of the length of their genitalia, I have to disagree with your response.

Men worry about this problem because women, including myself, really enjoy large penises when having sex.

Maybe you are more of a conservative than you present yourself as being. Maybe you haven't had sex with a guy?

I don't think you're being fair to your male readers.

You tell the people who write to you for advice to be honest. Be honest to your readers.

P.A., K-State student

DEAR P.A.,

You are absolutely right. I lied. To be truly "desired" sexually, you must be "big."

And while we are on the subject of size — how big are your genitalia, especially your breasts — are they really huge? Probably not big enough, I bet, which should make you feel really inadequate.

Most men I know want women with really huge breasts. So, what do you intend to do about it? An "honest" answer, please.

I could barely make use of the leg, and walked around awkwardly.

Mr. Peterson looked at me with her eyes wide, like I was going to stomp on her.

The feeling eventually went away and I was able to walk just fine.

Jell-O wrestling a first on K-State campus appropriate. We came in here and mastered the slime," they said.

The rulings were based purely on entertainment, said Bernard Franklin, assistant dean of student life and Jell-O judge.

"That and their theme, costumes and attitude."

One team that rated high with the audience in entertainment value was the "Officer and the Lady."

Jerad Cooper, senior in animal sciences and industry and of larger build, was the lady. George Eisele, junior in mechanical engineering, was the officer.

Their costumes included military fatigues complete with ammo belts, white sheets covering their heads and mirror sunglasses.

"It's all coming off," Cooper said.

When it did come off, another costume was revealed.

Wigs, makeup and bras stuffed with water balloons completed their second costume.

Before their match began, one of their competitors reached over and popped one of Eisele's water balloons. So, Eisele removed his remaining balloon, chased the offender and threw it at him.

"He got a breast reduction," an audience member said.

Judy Deaton-Qualls, senior in social work and Mortar Board member, celebrated her 46th birthday at the competition.

"It's a first. And who knows, maybe this will become a K-State tradition as big as the K-State-KU games," she said.

The wrestling pit was built with mattresses underneath, hay bales on the sides and a tarp over everything.

Although the green slime that partially filled the pit was called Jell-O, it is actually "a starch-grafted polymer with green tint added to it. The cost would have been astronomical if we used real Jell-O," said Dale Eustace, professor of grain science and industry and an Alpha Zeta adviser.

About 300 gallons of Jell-O were on hand, but only about half of it was used.

"We'll put it in a field to evaporate, and the starch will just blow away," Eustace said.

Buzby said this was environmentally safe.

"It's totally natural," Buzby said. "It's not harmful at all to the environment."

One of the difficulties in planning this event was dealing with conflicts from the Alan Jackson concert, Kirk said.

"We put a lot of time and effort into this. So, we went ahead with it. Actually, we did pretty good, considering the major concert," she said.

Raub said he thought the turnout would have been better if the Jell-O wrestling and the concert were combined.

"We would have a lot of publicity if we could've gotten Alan Jackson to participate in the Jell-O wrestling," Raub said.

No one injured in house blaze

Firefighters rescued four cats from an apartment fire Monday night.

The fire started in the basement of a converted duplex at 1919 College Heights Road. A couch and part of the living room were destroyed in the basement apartment.

The apartment's residents were not home at the time of the fire.

Manhattan Fire Department Battalion Chief Steve Burnett said the damage was largely confined to the living-room area of the apartment.

The other three apartments in the building received light smoke damage, Burnett said.

Residents directly above the apartment said their smoke alarm went off, and they called the fire department. Residents in another apartment said they smelled smoke but thought someone had just burned something while cooking.

The four cats were carried out of the apartment by firefighters, and paramedics treated the animals for smoke inhalation. Neighbors said the residents of the apartment also had a dog, but firefighters did not find one.

The manager of the complex declined to give her name but said pets were not allowed in the complex. She also said she could see through the window several cigarette butts spilled on the floor.

Burnett said a cigarette could have started the fire, but he would not know for sure until the investigation was completed.

POW/MIA WEEK

Arnold Air Society honors vets

Activities mark memory of those who did not return

ROY GRABER
Collegian

Members of Arnold Air Society have devoted this week to honoring prisoners of war and those missing in action.

Ted Glasco, group commander and sophomore in computer science, said the second annual POW/MIA week started Saturday with ribbon-tying to commemorate those missing in action.

Society members had a relay run Sunday from the Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Junction City to the one at K-State.

Kristi Brown, society project officer and junior in management, said the run got a lot of response.

"We had a police escort in Junction City, and we were all wearing black T-shirts with the POW/MIA logo," Brown said.

"We were carrying the big POW/MIA flag. There were a lot of honks, waves and peace signs, and one motorcyclist even asked us if we were taking donations."

Glasco said part of the organization's focus is to help create awareness about POWs as well as to perform acts of community and campus service.

Though POW/MIA week has a serious theme to it, he said the activities allow them to have fun.

"Every year we have a capture-the-flag contest," Glasco said. "We play on campus on teams and hide the flag. The goal is to capture their commander. The main focus is fun."

Capt. Jim Royer, society adviser and assistant professor of aerospace studies, said the group got a lot of motivation from Vietnam veteran Bill Arck, director of alcohol and other drug education services at Lafene Health Center.

Arck said when he first came to K-State, the only memorials for veterans on campus were at KSU Stadium, Danforth Chapel and All Faiths Chapel.

The only thing commemorated to Vietnam veterans was a plaque in the K-State Union.

"My involvement was approaching the ROTC folks and Arnold Air Society, and that's how the Vietnam Veterans Memorial committee got started," Arck said.

"It was a three-year process from me walking in the door in the Military Science Building to the dedication day of Nov. 10, 1989."

This week's POW/MIA activities include a table at the Union and group members sitting in a bamboo cage for a 24-hour period to symbolize POW conditions. T-shirts will also be sold at the table.

"Our main goal is to make awareness," Brown said. "There are many who haven't returned, including about 78,000 from World War II alone."

"The theme is that they are not forgotten, and we're hoping people will pay attention to that."

Talks try to avoid trade war

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BRUSSELS, Belgium—European ministers agreed Monday to seek a quick resumption of talks with the United States, but they also went along with France's demand that the European Community make its own list of retaliatory sanctions.

The intent of the talks was to avoid a trans-Atlantic trade war.

Italian Foreign Trade Minister Claudio Vitalone said the 12 EC states asked the bloc's Executive Commission to draft a list of U.S. goods to be targeted for trade sanctions.

The list would be used if Washington imposes punitive tariffs on white wines and other EC products.

During the meeting, most member-states said they wanted both sides to try again to resolve a series of farm-subsidy disputes before any sanctions are imposed.

"The need has been stressed to come to a conclusion with the Americans ... before the end of the year," said Nico Wegter, an EC Commission spokesman.

The ministers issued a statement in which they expressed "grave concerns at KANSAS CITY, Mo. — City officials won't know until January whether their offer to the National FFA Organization was good enough to keep the group's annual convention here past 1995.

FFA officials heard the city's plan during an hour and a half meeting Monday, and they said they would study it before deciding early next year whether to allow other cities to bid for the event.

Although the group, based in Alexandria, Va., has had the annual convention in Kansas City since 1927, FFA officials recently informed the city it might be able to get a better deal elsewhere.

COMMISSION TO MEET TONIGHT

The Manhattan City Commission will meet at 7 tonight to discuss issues tabled at the Nov. 3 meeting. Access problems kept a handicapped speaker from attending the meeting last week, which is the reason for the additional meeting. The issues were originally scheduled to be discussed at the regular meeting Nov. 17, which will still take place.

Lafene ends the old paper chase

Computers to aid health center, keep costs down

ANN DOOCY
Collegian

Lafene Health Center is nearly finished preparing for the future.

The installation of computers at Lafene will be completed in December, almost three years after the plan originated.

Lannie W. Zweimiller, director of Lafene, said it is time the health center get into the 21st century. "We've been behind the times," he said. "Throughout the last three years, a computerization committee was formed to make the transition from the paper chase to a new software system a smooth and easy one."

Zweimiller said Lafene wanted to integrate electronically from one department to another.

"Everything will be computerized from the time the student walks through the door," he said.

"Registration and tracking, which involves testing and patient care to billing will all be encompassed."

One year ago, the pharmacy department was set up as a sort of guinea pig, Zweimiller said.

Pharmacy director Bill Salero said since the computer's installation more than a year ago, the service has been faster and has improved.

"Business is up this year," Salero said. "We are taking care of more people, but we are more efficient. I'm very happy about how it turned out.

"There was a time I assumed I'd be long retired before I had to use a computer, but we've had no real problems."

Zweimiller said computer training began last week and will continue through Nov. 24.

"Business will continue although training will be conducted almost every day," Zweimiller said.

"There is a lot of shuffling going on, but the staff has been very cooperative."

The implementation is two weeks ahead of schedule, Zweimiller said. The hardware will be installed Nov. 12, and system testing will begin Dec. 7.

"We hope to catch any bugs in the system before the students leave for semester break," he said.

"That way, we will be able to work on the problems while business is down. Hopefully, by spring everything will be running smoothly."

Zweimiller said this has been a good experience overall.

"In some cases, like this gradual installation, things can get to be really terrible. It could even get nasty," he said.

"There's always that possibility with change, some unknown, when you don't know how it is going to work. We did cover as many bases as possible to minimize confusion and make the transition as easy as possible."

Students will see a more efficient service, and hopefully this will help keep health-care costs down, especially now since they are on the rise, Zweimiller said.

Transition '93: The New Administration

Economic summit planned

"I just think that it would be a very good thing for me and for the country to have two or three days where we really just focus on it, give some people the chance to have their say to me directly and talk about what our options are."

BILL CLINTON

Clinton says he wants to make a gradual transition

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. — President-elect Clinton detailed plans Monday for a pre-Christmas economic summit, and he began work in earnest on a White House transition that aides said was unlikely to yield many quick decisions.

Clinton opened the week by exercising his reach as both a sitting governor and president-elect, speaking by phone with three world leaders, meeting with his state Cabinet and lieutenant governor, then conferring with key members of his transition team.

Aides, meanwhile, set out to organize a summit of American business and economic leaders and to form transition "cluster groups" that will develop recommendations in various areas of policy.

As he left his statehouse office for the Governor's Mansion, Clinton described the summit as an outgrowth of his campaign promise to put economic recovery at the top of his agenda.

"I want to bring in some of the brightest people in the country, a broad range of backgrounds, talk to them about the gravity of the situation, deal with what our options are, get as many good ideas as I can," Clinton said.

Earlier in the day, Clinton met with his state Cabinet and his apparent successor, Lt. Gov. Jim Guy Tucker.

Tucker said he and Clinton had agreed on a state transition schedule but were not ready to provide details due to uncertainties about the mechanics of the change.

Clinton asked his Cabinet to identify any important decisions he needed to make before resigning. Senior aides said they believed any transfer of state power was several weeks away.

From the statehouse, it was back to the Governor's Mansion, where Clinton met with Vice President-elect Al Gore and senior aides, including transition director Warren Christopher.

Spokesman George Stephanopoulos said Clinton planned a conference call Tuesday with his full transition board, and the group would likely meet in Little Rock next week.

This week's goal, he said, was "working on his timetable for the whole transition period. Who exactly will be in place at what particular time, we don't know yet."

That suggested no big decisions were imminent, a view echoed by a senior Clinton aide close to the transition process.

"We're just getting started, remember," the adviser said.

As Clinton searches for a White House chief of staff, this adviser suggested the Democrat would define the role as "strong, coordinating, but not all-powerful."

Since getting the transition post, Christopher has been mentioned as a possible choice for chief of staff, but the adviser said Clinton had not voiced a preference.

Stephanopoulos said Clinton spoke by telephone Monday with German Chancellor Helmut Kohl, Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and South African President F.W. de Klerk.

Clinton returned congratulatory calls from all three. He said he looked forward to meeting each of them at the earliest possible date and stressed his desire for continuity, if not improved relations, Stephanopoulos said.

He plans calls to several more world leaders in the coming days.

"All he wants to do is establish contact," Stephanopoulos said, who said Clinton was avoiding any detailed discussions until he takes office.

Clinton spoke throughout the campaign of his plans to have an economic summit if he won. Aides are scurrying to bring together an array of economic and business leaders, with a target date of early December.

New senators have orientation on Capitol Hill

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Bathed in TV lights and looking a bit awestruck, 11 new senators arrived at the Capitol Monday to learn the nuts and bolts of their new jobs.

Among the vital lessons: How they and their staffs will get paid, ethics rules governing senators, where to go for computers and telephones — and just who those marble busts are surrounding the historic chamber. (They're former vice presidents.)

"I'm a little overwhelmed right at this moment," said Dianne Feinstein, a new Democratic senator from California who was at the center of a mob of reporters and cameras.

Driving to the Capitol past the city's monuments, "all of a sudden I looked at them a little differently," she said. As the car passed the Lincoln Memorial, "I said, 'Hello, Abe,' and someone in the car said, 'Welcome, Dianne.'"

Already, the Senate leadership has to face one question raised by the three-fold increase in the number of female senators: lack of a women's restroom near the chamber. Majority Leader George Mitchell said one would be built.

POLITICS

GOP tries to get back on track

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Sobered by their abrupt fall from power, members of the Republican Party are arguing vehemently among themselves over what went wrong and how to get back in sync with American voters.

They are a party at a crossroads of ideas, of generations, of leadership.

There are deep divisions among the factions trying to lead the party and among the contenders for the 1996 White House race.

And while the election of a new party chairman in January could offer some hint of a new GOP direction, the ultimate resolution is four years down the road when primary voters will pick a new standard-bearer.

The intervening years promise a continuous struggle among pragmatists, ideologues and those simply disillusioned with the old guard.

Already there is sharp debate. Has the party adopted too much of the religious-right social agenda, or not enough? Has it strayed too far from supply-side, trickle-down economics, or not far enough?

Moderate Labor Secretary Lynn Martin, in the running for party chairman, squared off against conservative strategist Angela Bay Buchanan last week in a typical confrontation.

Buchanan, who managed her brother Patrick's presidential campaign, said Republicans won't win again until they reinforce their conservative base. She has called for a new chairman who opposes abortion and supports "traditional values."

"We can't be out there pandering to different groups," Buchanan said Friday on a TV talk show. "What we need as a party is to stand for something."

Inebriated folks need shuttle

THE ISSUE

The number of alcohol-related deaths are reduced through the efforts of groups like BADD, MADD and SADD.

WE SUGGEST

To support these programs, Manhattan should take steps to provide a shuttle service for those too drunk to drive.

Last holiday season, nearly 850 people died on our nation's highways as a result of alcohol-related accidents.

It's a big, sad number, considering the increasing trend throughout the country toward education and responsibility in the hopes of preventing drunken driving and its deadly effects.

The Manhattan community has an opportunity to make some real progress in preventing drunken driving during the holidays by reinstating some sort of free shuttle or cab for those who are smart enough to know they've had too much to drive.

Groups — such as Bartenders Against Drunk Driving, Mothers Against Drunk Driving and Students Against Driving Drunk — work tirelessly year-round to prevent alcohol-related accidents.

And our law-enforcement officials have stepped up efforts to educate people and enforce drunken driving laws.

The work they do is sorely needed.

But more can and should be done.

The shuttle idea has been tried with varying results in the past, both here and in other cities.

The "BADD cabs" that once shuttled people who had been drinking home from Manhattan bars are no longer around, because the service was abused. It turned into a way to bar-hop, and some people depended on the cabs instead of drinking responsibly and designating drivers.

One K-State fraternity started its own shuttle program last year — Brothers Against Drunk Driving.

And in Topeka, a new program called Topeka We Care will be tried out this holiday season. It is similar to Manhattan's BADD cabs.

There are plenty of people out there dedicated to keeping drunks off the streets. But they could also put their heads and their energy together and help design a shuttle program for Manhattan that will work and survive.

Bush did plenty to sink the Republicans' White House hopes

The losers of the presidential election, the Republicans, seem to have this notion that the media booted Bush from office. They forget that some 60 percent of the American electorate voted against him.

Media bias complaints aren't new. Politicians have consistently used them to push attention away from their shortcomings as leaders. The more obvious and irreparable those shortcomings, the more adamantly that particular individual or party cries foul at the media.

Case in point: this year's Republicans.

Unfortunately for the Republicans and the country as a whole, George Bush should never have been elected to begin with. For that unpleasant detour in American history, we can partly thank the Democrats for serving up Dukakis. But equally to blame are the voters themselves, who bought into Bush's campaign rhetoric. Insert Reagan Democrats at will.

And unfortunately for Republicans, but often to the amusement of the rest of us, the media had to occasionally rub their smug little GOP snouts in the president's failings so they wouldn't "forget" them. They have a tendency to do this when elections roll around.

The funny thing is, many Republicans didn't need the media to blast the president. They were busy doing it themselves.

They started to get a true feel for him when he chose Quayle for his running mate — a move Republican idol Barry Goldwater said he first heard about while he was in the bathtub. Goldwater said the news almost made him drown.

For many conservatives who remained supportive of Bush after he bagged Quayle, the Broken Lips Pledge was an A-bomb. It left their party, for all intents and purposes, without a credible candidate.

Jack Kemp, possible future Republican candidate, called the handling of that situation one of the worst political blunders he'd ever seen.

But with all that and much more, what is the real reason Bush lost?

Why, the liberal media, of course.

It would seem, if Bush were actually the best of the best of the Republican ranks — as his nomination for president would tend to suggest — that maybe they would try to stay his political course in the future.

MARK ENGLER

It would also seem that influential conservatives might actually like him themselves before they complain that the media don't.

And that's where we really get a sense of the Republican hypocrisy regarding this media bias business.

To the question of whether the media favored Clinton: Unquestionably. Without a doubt. Absolutely.

But where were the fair-minded conservative hordes four years ago when CNN's Bernard Shaw asked Dukakis, in a nationally televised debate, if he would support the death penalty if his wife were murdered? His weak response, incidentally, paved the way for "Liberal" Bill's adoption of a pro-death penalty Democratic platform.

But Republicans didn't see near the media slant with that situation they did with questioning Bush/Quayle on such hypotheticals as how they would respond to female members of their families seeking abortions.

Further, in four years, how "fair" are disgruntled Americans, Republicans in particular, going to want the "objective" media to be with an incumbent with baggage like Bush's?

If Clinton has even a hint of the oozing wounds afflicting Bush — such as Iran-Contra, Iraq-gate, memory lapses regarding central campaign promises, the economy and Dan Quayle — the media will be all over him with salt.

And, without a doubt, applause from the right will be thunderous. That old sour-grapes contempt for "media bias" will be about as apparent as Pat Buchanan at an ACT-UP rally.

BICYCLES

Campus problem is receiving attention

Editor,

Recently, much attention has been given to the problem of bicycles on campus. Pedestrians, with good reason, are afraid of being run down by bicycles on campus, and bicyclists argue that there are not enough practical places to secure their bikes around campus.

As part of a research project for my Public Speaking II class, I talked to several people about the problem and I found out that something is indeed being done about it.

I assure you that the problem is being given more than a passing consideration by the administration, and solutions to the problem are being considered and implemented each day.

Currently, new bike racks are being designed along with safer, more practical places to put them, so bicyclists can lock their bikes and walk onto campus with at least a reasonable feeling of security.

Also, new bicycle paths are being considered, as well as improving the existing ones.

However, these things take time and money, neither of which is readily available, so they will not be available immediately. As a result, the problems will continue at least for a while.

Until better solutions can be implemented, I encourage people to continue to walk their bikes across campus and use caution elsewhere. When better solutions do come along, I encourage everyone to support them in order to resolve the problem.

ROLES/ASPIRATIONS

All students need equal representation

Editor,

I would like to express my appreciation to Jackie McClaskey and Jim Persinger for coming to hear students express their concerns about the Role and Aspirations statement. Being two of the three student representatives on the Provost's Committee that is now reviewing the Role and Aspirations document, the efforts to get the students' perspectives are crucial.

Student representation should be a priority in all aspects of this University. Being a student who is directly affected by the proposed cuts, I do not feel that the students were adequately represented.

There were supposed to be two student representatives on the committee. It is the body that initially investigated and made recommendations on which programs would be cut or added. These students only attended a few out of the many committee meetings that were held.

There has been a dispute over whose fault it was that this occurred. Whether it was the fault of the chairman of the Core Committee to not seek out other students who would and could have represented their peers, or whether it was the fault of the student representatives themselves not to recognize that they were unable or were not being informed of the meetings.

It is of no importance now, because we will never know if anyone was to take all the blame.

The issue now is that this lack of student representation does not happen again. Student Senate, the Arts and Sciences Council and individual campus organizations that exist have concerned and capable people to participate in affairs that affect all students and the University as a whole.

Individuals in administrative positions should actively seek out these students in order to get all views represented.

I urge the faculty, Core Committee, Provost's Committee and President Jon Wefald to have student representatives if they do not already and to actually get responses from the students themselves. It is sad to think that this University will only get response from students in the form of protests.

This process needs to be improved so that students do not feel that protesting is the only way to be heard.

GOAL POST INCIDENT

Editorial board is just a stick in mud

Editor,

The Collegian strikes again! The Collegian's Editorial Board needs to stop its incessant whining and give K-State football fans some credit, instead of chastising them, like in the Nov. 9 issue. Yes, you are correct, the football team did not beat the No. 1 team in the country Thursday night. However, our football team did snap a four-game losing streak along with playing a much better game than it has in previous showings.

The fans who rushed onto the field were excited for their team, the players and the school. Admittedly, tearing down a goal post is not the most conventional way of showing support, but at least they only tore down one. They're probably saving the other for when we beat Oklahoma State Nov. 21. Better get your editorial pens warmed up.

Unlike the Collegian Editorial Board, athletic department director Milt Richards was appreciative enough to thank the fans for supporting the football team. Thank you, Milt Richards, for focusing on the positive and recognizing all the K-State football fans for creating an "enthusiastic environment" and for helping to "inspire our team to victory." I agree with Richards, and not with the Editorial Board who referred to some exuberant fans as a "childish mob" that needs to "wake up and get a grip on financial reality."

As for me, I will keep on supporting the football team, the coaches, K-State and all the fans who are willing to buy tickets to support the team. And I will continue to ignore the opinions of the Collegian's pro-Clinton, anti-campus bikers, sticks-in-the-mud, politically correct-minded editorial board.

Bible calls the ball on homosexuality

SCOTT SPRADLIN

The controversy over the abortion issue may soon be paralleled, if not overshadowed, by another dividing contention among the American people: homosexuality. And like abortion, this issue promises not to go away.

Again the lines are drawn, people move to one side or the other, and the gauntlet is thrown down. The contest is on. Debates ensue between clergy, scientists and politicians.

One politician engaging in the battle is Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass. He has revealed himself to be in favor of homosexuality. The evidence speaks in the form of House bills S. 574 and its companion H.R. 1430, both introduced by Kennedy.

These bills endorse and sanction, with great approval, homosexual marriages. They also include the teaching of acceptance of homosexuality as an acceptable lifestyle to elementary-school children in public schools. These bills may very well force churches to hire homosexuals regardless of any previous anti-homosexual policy held by a church.

Whoa, horsie! Let's stop right there for a moment.

All of this ruffles me more than just a tiny bit. Especially that last item. Since when does the state become involved in church activities? Apparently the whole matter of separation of church and state is more muddled than anyone in the ACLU cares to admit.

Regardless of the moral shift of some churches to accept homosexuals as members, and even as clergy, there are numerous churches standing fast on biblical teachings regarding homosexuality. The latter are the churches refusing to make biblical authority and instruction secondary data in such matters. They are to be applauded for their steadfastness in preserving moral correctness.

Forcing churches to hire homosexuals would be the same as forcing them to hire drunkards, prostitutes or adulterers. Such an action would be forcing Bible-believing churches to go against their moral and spiritual foundations — to go against God.

For those religiously minded types, it is not only the Old Testament that puts forth prohibition against homosexuality. In the New Testament, 1 Corinthians 6:9 lists homosexuality as something sinful along with gossip, slander and other forms of sexual immorality. All of these have something to do with willful human behavioral decisions.

Rather than use the word homosexual, Romans 1:24 describes homosexual activity as something immoral, so it is not a matter of how our modern language translates the Greek word for homosexual.

This is not a hate message for homosexuals. It is simply an honest examination of what scriptures teach about this issue.

Should a church be subject to popular belief and change its policy accordingly? I say no. Should a church be subject to the whims of one politician influencing government policies? Absolutely not. That would be following the will of men over the will of God.

The Bible calls for a high moral standard, especially for leaders of congregations and teachers of the Bible. I for one accept the criteria of the Bible over the criteria of Senator Kennedy.

I no more want a homosexual pastor than I want a heterosexual pastor who "sleeps around," or a pastor who is addicted to booze. These things go directly against my beliefs as a Christian.

I want someone I can trust. Someone who is devoted to honestly living out and teaching the truth of the Bible rather than the flimsy proposals of Mr. Kennedy.

ASIAN-AMERICAN AWARENESS MONTH

Customs of Japan defined

"What is it you're going to do when you go to another country and see something you don't know? You're going to associate it with something you already know."

KYOKO MIZUNO

COLLEGIAN STAFF

Adapting to different patterns of social behavior was the topic of a workshop on Japanese culture Friday in the K-State Union.

Kyoko Mizuno, instructor of Japanese, spoke about Japanese culture and customs as part of Asian-American Awareness Month.

Mizuno also showed two videos that addressed business and social aspects of Japan.

"What is it you're going to do when you go to another country and see something you don't know? You're going to associate it with something you already know," Mizuno said.

Much of the information she presented pertained to the differences between Japanese and American business practices.

The typical Japanese business day can last from 10 to 12 hours. Business functions can include going to bars and restaurants after work to socialize, finalize deals, or increase solidarity with fellow workers, according to the video.

Consequently, many Japanese businessmen burn out early in life, Mizuno said.

"Karoshi is a condition when people are so exhausted they become sick," Mizuno said.

She said the average Japanese man reaches karoshi at the age of 47, and at that point, the person either retires or needs treatment.

Mizuno also presented social nuances of Japanese culture, for instance when it is proper to bow, when to exchange business cards, giving and receiving gifts and family seals.

According to the video, Valentine's Day is the newest trend in Japan. Many tokens of affection are sold, even "obligatory chocolates," are purchased for those for whom one may not especially care.

Mizuno said Karaoke drive-ins are another hot trend in Japan. Friends come in groups, have food brought in and knock themselves out on Karaoke Sandra Goering, senior in agriculture economics, won the $1,200 All Chapter Scholarship from the Alpha Zeta Washington, D.C., Alumni Association.

Her application was selected by campus advisers and sent to the national chapter as the K-State representative. She was one of four students nationwide selected to receive the scholarship.

"I was excited to simply be a representative of K-State. But when I won, it was really a great honor," Goering said.

The scholarship is based on activities within the College of Agriculture, a student's need and

"The students don't know what scholarship they are going to receive," Eustace said. "Their applications are submitted, and the national chapter

A K-State biology professor has been awarded a supplement to a grant for his research on the eye.

David Rintoul received the grant from the National Eye Institute for research on the purification and characterization of MIP26, a channel-forming protein from the lens fiber cell membrane in the eye.

"The project is designed to better understand the protein, how it works, how it's put together and what its regulatory components are," he said.

He said he hopes his research will help other researchers in their quest to prevent cataracts.

Rintoul, who has been with K-State since January 1981, said the MIP26 protein is unusual because it is only found in the lens of the eye. He said what is understood about this protein may

Plasma donating profitable, but not always pleasant

Center provides service; students say risks are minimal

KARREY BRITT

Collegian

About 600 people a week donate plasma at the North American Biologicals Center in Manhattan, said the center's assistant manager, Joel Spomer.

"About 40 percent of those who donate in this area are college students," Spomer said. "Military make up another 40 percent."

These donors provide vitally important blood products for patients in need through a process called plasmapheresis, Spomer said.

Plasmapheresis involves drawing small amounts of blood from the donor's arm. The blood is separated by a fast spinning motion. The plasma portion of blood is then put into a separate collection unit. The instrument will automatically return the red-cells portion back to the donor.

This procedure is repeated until the correct amount of plasma is collected. The amount is based upon body weight and generally takes about 45 minutes to collect.

A first-time donor can expect to spend about two hours at the clinic, because the donor must have a thorough medical history check.

A physician studies the medical history and lab results and gives the person a mini-physical examination to determine if the person is qualified to donate.

Donors can give plasma twice a week and are paid $10 for the first donation and $15 for the second, if they give within that week and there is a 48-hour interval between donations, he said.

"I consider giving plasma as a job," said Amy Clark, senior in journalism and mass communications. "I made about $80 a month when I worked on campus, but I can make $100 a month by donating."

Mike Callahan, senior in park resources management, said he also gives for the money.

"I have to pay the bills, and the process doesn't hurt unless they need to probe around looking for my vein. Then, it hurts," he said.

The process of giving plasma does have several risk factors, Spomer said.

One is the feeling of dizziness, nausea and fainting during or after the procedure. Another is the inability to return red cells to the donor, which may lower the hemoglobin and require an eight-week wait before plasma may be given again.

"About 90 percent of our procedures go smooth," Spomer said. "Only about 5 percent have complications."

The most common complication is the clotting of blood at the needle, Spomer said. This occurs when the veins give out or the donor moves his or her arm.

"If this happens, we can't transfer the blood in or out. So, we stick a needle in the other arm," Spomer said.

Clark said the first time she gave blood, her blood clotted. This resulted in a complete blood loss (no replacement of red blood cells). Consequently, she was not able to give for two months.

Clark said she had trouble with clotting for about two months after that.

Jeff Chauza, junior in marketing, has been giving for three years and said he has never had any complications.

There are some temporary problems, Spomer said.

"Some people will get up in the morning and try to donate but their blood or pulse is too low. Others may have a reaction because they have not eaten."

Donna Luehrman, 34, of Fort Riley, said she has trouble with her hemoglobin count being too low.

"I have been taking vitamins and dieting to keep my hemoglobin count up," she said.

Eric Saathoff, junior in geography, said he has trouble with his heart rate being too low.

Clark said the second time she gave, she fainted in the waiting room.

"I hadn't eaten anything that day," Clark said. "The next thing I remember is having ice packs on me and someone giving me water."

There is a physician in the center at all times, Spomer said. The phlebotomists, the personnel members who actually stick the needle into the arm and hook the donor up to the machine, are also trained to help with any complications or emergencies.

"Those who work at NABI go through a three-month training program," Spomer said. "They are paired with a training specialist and crossed-trained in areas."

No previous training is required. Clark said she was impressed by the staff at the center.

"They are really nice and fun to talk with," she said. "I was also impressed with how very clean the center is."

Nina Hennkens, senior in architecture, said she agrees with Clark, especially after giving plasma at the Columbia, Mo., donor center this summer.

"It looked like a warehouse from the outside, and the inside consisted of torn,

San Francisco rolls over Atlanta 41-3

Young's passes leads 49ers to 2nd dominant victory within 3 weeks

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ATLANTA — Steve Young proved that long-term revenge overshadowed the short-term variety Monday night.

Young passed for 143 yards and three touchdowns and San Francisco's defense came up with six turnovers as the 49ers routed Atlanta for the second time in three weeks, 41-3.

The outcome was never in doubt as the 49ers left Atlanta no room to pull off a game-ending "Hail Mary" pass as it did in downing San Francisco last year.

"I think last year kind of really stuck with us," Young said of losing twice to the Falcons.

"It cost us all the things that we worked for," he said. "It was not easy to sit on."

Those two losses cost the 49ers a spot in the playoffs at a time when they were playing as well as any NFL team.

Atlanta's short-term revenge went back just three weeks, when the 49ers crushed the Falcons 56-17 in San Francisco.

The 49ers, now 7-2 in the year, climbed back into a tie with New Orleans for first place in the NFC West and the Falcons fell to 3-6.

"It was not a pretty sight," Atlanta coach Jerry Glanville said. "We made it occupational suicide. I thought we played hard and got after them but you just can't beat a good football team by giving the ball away."

Young's scoring passes covered 12 yards to Odessa Turner in the first quarter, 21 yards to Ricky Watters in the second and 19 yards to Jerry Rice in the final period.

Merton Hanks fielded a bouncing punt less than two minutes after the Rice touchdown and returned it 48 yards for another score.

The Niners have twice been victims of "Hail Mary" passes in Atlanta — losing 17-14 last year and 28-24 in 1983.

Tom Rathman scored the other touchdown on a 2-yard run and Mike Cofer kicked field goals of 40 and 32 yards.

"I think we had six turnovers and, geez, when you get that many, you should win the game," San Francisco coach George Seifert said.

"Whenever you can turn the ball over and give it to our offense, that's usually points on the board," Bill Romanowski said. "That's what our defense has got to do to win."

Atlanta got a 33-yard field goal from Norm Johnson with two seconds left in the half, cutting the lead to 14-3.

It capped a 75-yard drive in which Billy Joe Tolliver accounted for all the yardage while completing six of eight passes.

The tone was set early when Keith Jones took in a short pass from Tolliver and fumbled it a way.

Romanowski claiming it for the 49ers at the Atlanta 48.

It took nine plays for Young to convert it into a lead the 49ers never lost. Young completed four passes for 34 yards and Watters ran for 17 yards in the drive that ended with the 12-yard pass to Turner with 4:54 left in the first period.

The 49ers failed to convert another first-quarter turnover into points.

Three plays after the Young-to-Turner touchdown, Don Griffin intercepted a Tolliver pass off Andre Rison's hands at the Atlanta 43.

San Francisco failed to move and had to punt.

San Francisco also wasted a 43-yard run by Watters to its 48 after Johnson had punted 37 yards on a fake field goal, out of bounds on the 49ers 2.

Young set up his 21-yard scoring pass to Watters with a 20-yarder to Brent Jones at the Atlanta 31 late in the second quarter.

Cofer's first field goal capped a 25-yard, eight-play drive and the 32-yarder came after Rison's fumble was recovered by Michael McGruder on the Atlanta 35.

Deion Sanders dropped the ensuing kickoff and Amp Lee recovered at the Atlanta 26, setting up Rathman's 2-yard scoring run.

The 'true' meaning of Cats' season

In a word, the Wildcat football season can be summed up quite nicely — disappointing.

In fact, the 1992 season has taken Wildcat fans by such surprise that we're tearing down the goal post after beating the Iowa State Cyclones.

The 3-6 Iowa State Cyclones.

Indeed, it's been a rough year.

This was supposed to be the season when the Cats returned to a bowl game. This was supposed to be the season when K-State football was put on the map. This was supposed to be the season when Wildcat football was synonymous with excellence.

It hasn't quite worked out that way. Not even close.

But let's not lose perspective — life goes on.

Maybe, just maybe, we should reflect on the current season and try to accept it for what it's worth — a losing campaign that won't have any bearing on the world order, the positioning of the stars or whether Madonna's book will come out in home video.

Maybe we should take a look at the season and smile at the same time. Hey, folks, we're 4-4 and starting, once again, to play like a true contender.

Alas, I submit the following. The sports staff has put together its own Chris Berman-esque list, albeit a weak one, of Wildcat football players, coaches, managers, ground crew members, water boys and anybody else whose name was easy to work with.

When reading the list, we ask you to remember just one thing: We don't claim to be humorous — we just try to be.

RUGBY

Women's team 3rd at Ozark tourney

FRANK KLEEMANN
Collegian

K-State's women's rugby club finished off its season with a third-place finish at the Ozark tournament Saturday and Sunday in Little Rock, Ark.

One day before the tournament, K-State's players teamed up with their companions of Kansas City as a Heart of America team and ended up with three players being selected to the Western Territorial team.

Lonndon Seely, Dana

Teagarden and LaDonna Grenz were among about 30 players selected out of the regional teams of Texas, Ozark, Colorado and Heart of America.

In the Ozark tourney, K-State started in the double-elimination play with a 19-15 loss to the Oklahoma Roses.

Team member Mimi Doukas said the Wildcats' defeat was a little frustrating.

"Our team always takes half of the game as warm-up period," she said. "We could have won, but they were the best team in the tournament."

Doukas said Oklahoma's backs were extremely good, and K-State just didn't get it together in the first half.

"Our scrum usually dominates the other team, but this time the scrums were even," she said. "But we were a lot smoother in the second half. We came back and worked as a team."

However, K-State couldn't even out Oklahoma's halftime lead of 14-10, playing to a 5-5 tie in the second half.

The Cats bounced back in their second game of the tourney, against Air Force Academy. Despite playing against a physically hard team, K-State won with a shutout 15-0.

"Air Force is one of the toughest teams we played in the season," Doukas said. "They played mean. They bite and kick, and everything hurts after the game. But their offense was terrible, and we controlled them."

Against Arkansas on Sunday, the Cats started slow and needed to go into sudden death to overcome their opponent 10-5.

"We played kind of sloppy," Doukas said. "We weren't organized. We couldn't control the ball a lot."

Rookie Teagarden was the player who saved K-State third place in the tournament, scoring just five minutes into the sudden death.

"We scored right away. It was like a second wind," Doukas said.

SPORTS DIGEST

► GALLON BIG EIGHT OFFENSIVE PLAYER OF THE WEEK

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — Linebacker Trev Alberts of Nebraska and running back Eric Gallon of K-State were named players of the week Monday in the Big Eight Conference.

Gallon rushed for a season-high 164 yards on 24 carries as K-State ended a four-game losing streak with a 22-13 victory over Iowa State.

He scored two touchdowns, including a career-long 56-yard score.

Gallon won offensive honors in a split vote over tight end Gerald Armstrong of Nebraska, who had three receptions for 60 yards and two touchdowns in the victory over Kansas.

Alberts had eight sacks, including two quarterback sacks, as the Nebraska defense held off the Kansas offense in a 49-7 nationally televised game.

Alberts also was credited with hurrying the quarterback four times in the game that left Nebraska alone atop the conference standings.

► PINIELLA SIGNS 3-YEAR CONTRACT WITH SEATTLE

SEATTLE — Lou Piniella, who managed the Cincinnati Reds to a World Series title in 1990, became manager of the Seattle Mariners Monday.

The Mariners had the worst record in the American League last season.

Piniella, 49, signed a three-year contract worth $2.5 million. The Mariners have the option of picking up Piniella's contract for the 1996 season.

Piniella resigned as the Cincinnati manager last month after managing the Reds to 90 victories despite a number of injuries to key players.

In Seattle, he will take over a franchise that has had only one winning season in 16 years.

"It's a tremendous challenge for me," Piniella said. "I hope this is my last managing job."

"I don't know why this organization has lost 15 out of 16 years. But like Bill Clinton said, we can do better than that, and we're going to do better than that."

Piniella was named 1969 AL Rookie of the Year for the Kansas City Royals.

Germans recall violence of past

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BERLIN — Nearly 100,000 Germans demonstrated across the country Monday to mark the 54th anniversary of the Nazis' "Crystal Night" attacks on Jews, and to protest a wave of neo-Nazi violence.

Monday also was the third anniversary of the fall of the Berlin Wall. But the German celebration of that watershed was somber after violence by anarchists Sunday disrupted a huge Berlin rally against right-wing extremism.

The violence prompted Chancellor Helmut Kohl's chief of staff, Friedrich Bohl, to urge tougher laws allowing police to act against troublemakers in advance.

But Bohl conceded a lack of political consensus for such laws. Kohl's conservative coalition partner, the Christian Social Union, boycotted Sunday's rally and demanded the government take steps to stem the influx of refugees.

President Richard von Weizsaecker, who was splattered with eggs by the anarchists, said in a national television appearance Monday that he was ready to be in more protests to show his solidarity with foreigners.

Nazi thugs attacked synagogues and Jewish homes and businesses throughout Germany on Nov. 9, 1938, killing more than 90 Jews, arresting 30,000 and breaking so much glass it became known as "Crystal Night."

It marked the start of open persecution of Jews and ushered in the Holocaust, which claimed the lives of 6 million European Jews.

Commemorative marches took place in Rome, where about 10,000 people beneath flickering torches wound through the old Jewish ghetto. At the head of the column were seven concentration-camp survivors locked arm in arm.

In Tel Aviv, dozens of Israelis, including children of Holocaust survivors, marched outside the German Embassy to protest rising anti-foreigner violence.

In Bremen, about 1,000 people at a ceremony heard Ignatz Bubis, the head of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, admonish political leaders to stand up to extreme rightists.

The rightists have been attacking foreign refugees and defacing Jewish memorials.

Bubis said weak leadership was a prime cause of the collapse of Germany's post-World War I democracy, the Weimar Republic.

But Berlin Mayor Eberhard Diepgen said the important thing was the huge turnout at Sunday's rally — not the leftist protests.

"The democrats came out, 350,000 and more, and demonstrated in Berlin. That didn't happen in the Weimar Republic, and that is the difference," he said.

It fits like a glove.

Judge was obsessed, FBI says

New York jurist accused of threats to ex-mistress

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — As the state's top judge, Sol Wachtler seemed to have it all: a brilliant career and a happy, 41-year marriage.

But the FBI painted a darker portrait — a man so obsessed with an attractive socialite he may have ruined his life for her.

Within two days, Wachtler, 62, went from respected jurist, prominent Republican politician and admirable family man to tabloid headliner.

He was arrested Saturday on charges of trying to blackmail his mistress after she ended their affair.

While his associate judges in Albany considered whether to suspend him from his $120,000-a-year post, Wachtler was confined to a small room at Long Island Jewish Hospital.

He was under 24-hour guard for fear he might kill himself, said Flip Lorenzoni, chief deputy U.S. marshal in New York City.

Wachtler was scheduled for a bail hearing Tuesday in federal court in Manhattan.

His accuser was identified as Joq Silverman, 45, a Republican Party fundraiser. She is estranged from her husband, an industrialist, and lives in a Park Avenue apartment with her teen-age daughter. She has a weekend house in affluent Southampton.

The FBI complaint detailed stalking and harassment that resulted from passion gone sour.

"SOL'S TWO LIVES," blared the New York Daily News. "I'M SORRY — Judge Speaks From Hosp Room On Scheme to Torment Ex-Lover," screamed the New York Post. "WACHTLER'S OBSESSION," said New York Newsday.

Wachtler, described as charming and erudite, was charged with telephoning threats and sending obscene letters to his ex-mistress from all over the country.

The father of four sent a lewd letter containing a wrapped condom to Silverman's 14-year-old daughter, and he demanded $20,000 from Silverman in exchange for embarrassing tapes and photographs of her and her new lover, authorities said.

He also is accused of threatening to kidnap her daughter.

The calls to Silverman taped by the FBI don't sound like a man who was considered a potential gubernatorial candidate and mentioned as a possible U.S. Supreme Court justice.

Many powerful state officials were stunned by Wachtler's arrest and his alleged double life.

Peter Affatato, who heads a state court character committee and is a former president of Nassau County Bar Association, interviewed Wachtler before his admission to the New York bar.

"This is a man who I would almost give up my entire career for," said Affatato, who has known Wachtler for 40 years. "I know him as a lawyer, judge and friend. I am in total shock over the news."

Actors tackle dual roles

J. MATTHEW RHIA/Collegian

During a rehearsal for a play in a British penal colony in Australia, Sideway (Kevin Kelly) overacts his role, much to the dismay of the director, Lt. Clark (M. Alex Lonpe). The KSU Theatre Group is presenting "Our Country's Good," which requires dual roles of the actors.

■ "Our Country's Good" will be at 8 p.m. Nov. 12-14 and Nov. 18-21 in Nichols Theatre.

'Our Country's Good' shows that people can change

DAN GRAFEL
Collegian

Twelve actors will play 22 parts in the KSU Theatre Group's presentation of "Our Country's Good."

The play, written by Timberlake Wertenbaker, is a fact-based story of the establishment of a British penal colony on the continent of Australia in 1787.

"The play explores issues about art and questions the traditional conventions of theater," said director Kate Anderson, associate professor of theater.

She said the actors face difficulties when the two characters they play have opposing viewpoints and even different dialects.

"It's a real challenge, but I think they're really enjoying that," she said. She said the issues that appear in the play are also important issues in life.

She explained one scene where the convicts question the British officers about their role in the play.

"It's about people asking 'why isn't my role in life as important as someone else's,'" she said.

Anderson said the play also talks about censorship in a scene called "The authorities discuss the merits of the theater."

In the scene, the officers support elements of the play that hold up the status quo, but they reject those lines that challenge existing ideas.

She said an aborigine poet appears in the play to explore the ideas of "discovery and the whole idea of colonizing."

"Every time we go to colonize, we end up destroying what is already there," she said.

Anderson said she chose this particular play because one of the major things it says is "people are capable of change."

"It's a hopeful play about the potential of people and their ability to change when treated like human beings," she said.

She said the music and the scenery also play an important role in setting the play's mood.

Live musicians play a mix of traditional British music crossed with tribal music of the native aborigines.

The stage, designed by Michael Amico, assistant professor in speech, resembles the deck of a sailing ship which sits on a large map that covers the floor of the foreground.

"Not only does it represent a journey to a new land, but it also symbolizes an emotional journey," Anderson said of the set.

MUSIC

Brass Ensemble set for fall concert

SHEDERA BAUSCH
Collegian

The K-State Brass Ensemble will present its fall concert today in All Faiths Chapel.

Gary Mortenson, assistant professor of music, will direct the concert. Mortenson has auditions once a year for musicians interested in performing with the group. This is his fourth year as director.

The ensemble is only able to practice once a week so the members must work harder because the music has to come together quickly, Mortenson said.

"We are very proud of our group," Mortenson said. "They work together to make the show happen."

Trumpet player Kevin Hupe, who has been with the group for three years, said the ensemble is very focused on providing a spectacular program.

"Regardless of the fact of not having a lot of practice time we will put together a quality performance," Hupe, who is a senior in music education, said.

Trumpet player Chris Erker said the group has improved over the previous years. Erker, senior in music education, has been playing with the ensemble for four years.

"We have definitely come a long way. Not just one person makes the group, everyone works together," Erker said.

K-State Union Proposed Mission Statement

As part of the K-State Union Total Quality Management effort, - "Quality Begins with U," the Union has drafted a mission statement. We would like you to read this statement and provide us with any comments or suggestions you may have. If you care to respond, please use the Suggestion Box across from the Check Cashing Windows on the first floor of the K-State Union. We will be more than happy to address your concerns.

The K-State Union is a center for the campus community and plays an integral role in the educational mission of the University. It provides products, services, and programs to enhance the quality of life of its students, faculty, staff, alumni, and guests, with particular emphasis on students. It fosters an environment which promotes the respect of all peoples and values diversity, leadership development, and the free exchange of ideas.

Thank you for your time.

cracked chairs," she said. "The process was completely different than at NABI, because at Columbia they completely reattached the blood I had given. Then, the force of gravity put the red blood cells back into my arm. "They used a regular weight scale to measure the blood given, and then I yelled when it hit a certain level," she said. "The whole process was weird. "The overall impression was very dirty and scary. They claimed they had no problems, but I never gave there again. I really missed NABI." There are two other NABI centers in Kansas. One is located in Lawrence, and the other is in Kansas City. The NABI center in Lawrence has about 400 donors a week, said

Darin Komma, assistant manager. "About 50 percent of our donors are college students, and the other 50 percent are locals," he said. However, only about 10 percent of the donors at the Kansas City center are college students, center manager Steve Hawkins said. "We have about 500 donors a week," Hawkins said. "Ninety percent of them are low income." NABI is the largest independent provider of human blood plasma elements to the health-care industry worldwide, according to a brochure published by its headquarters in Miami. "I give plasma because I know it can help people like my mother and burn patients," Luehrman said. "My mother has leukemia, and she needs plasma to make up her new blood when she has transfusions."

help researchers understand other channel-forming proteins. The supplement Rintoul received was provided specifically for the support of a minority undergraduate student researcher. The supplement makes it possible for the student to conduct research and get paid at the same time.

Gloria Fernandez, senior in environmental science and resources from San Juan, Puerto Rico, assists Rintoul in his research.

Fernandez said she decided to help in the research because of a class she was taking at the time.

Rintoul said Fernandez, who has been helping with the research for more than a year, is involved with purifying the protein and characterizing a new way of preparing it.

Fernandez said she came to K-State because she was interested in pursuing a veterinary medicine degree. She soon became interested in other areas of biology and environmental science and decided to pursue them.

"In vet med, you either go into research or clinical sciences, and I'd prefer to do something for the international world," she said.

"In environmental design and resources, you have many different areas to work from internationally." Fernandez said the techniques used in the laboratory can be beneficial to a student.

She said any lab research does more than just solve scientific problems.

"It gives you a chance to apply what you have learned," she said. "It shows you different ways of thinking and analyzing problems."

decides the winners. That was why she was so excited when she won." The All Chapter Scholarship is the second-largest scholarship among the Alpha Zeta, Eustace said.

Goering said she hasn't decided what she wants to do when she completes her degree in agriculture economics.

"I may go on to graduate school to study food sciences, or I may do some industry work. I hope to be involved with the food processing industry in some respect," Goering said.

In her application for the scholarship she wrote that she is exploring the possibility of nutrition and development work in the United States or Latin America.

"When I came to K-State, I knew I was interested in agriculture," Goering said. "I took a couple of classes and found an interest in food science. Those are the classes I enjoy, and it's what I love to do."

Goering said she joined the Alpha Zeta organization because it was well respected in the agriculture community. She said it also allowed her a chance to interact with students who are interested in agriculture.

New senators learn roles

The day-long orientation, behind closed doors, included a visit from Vice President-elect Al Gore. Participants said he told the new class "we are on the same new adventure" in trying to make the government work better.

Gore, who as vice president will also be president of the Senate, is expected to be an important liaison between the new Clinton White House and the lawmakers it will rely on to get its policies enacted.

Asked about the big issues facing them, many of the new senators mentioned reducing the federal budget deficit, stimulating the economy and revamping health care as top legislative priorities.

The new lawmakers ran into an early barrier when handed a thick book of the Senate's arcane rules, printed in small type. The job of breaking government gridlock may be more of a job than she reckoned, Feinstein said.

For all their newness, the freshmen are hardly novices. Most come from local elected offices, and one — Robert Bennett, a Republican from Utah — is the son of a former senator, Wallace Bennett.

The 11 sat through a succession of meals and speakers, most of them the low-profile people who make the Capitol run.

ESSENTIALS

Readers see singles club and dating services as solutions

DEAR READERS,

I have had many letters from those of you who are encountering difficulty in meeting people and are fed up with the "bar scene" and the "meat market," just to cite a few of your descriptions. Here are some of your comments.

DEAR CASSANDRA,

I think "Still Waiting" has an excellent idea in starting a singles club. I, too, am tired of the bar scene and would like to meet a "nice," romantic girl.

I transferred here this semester, and it seems that every girl I meet has a boyfriend, is engaged or married. Aggieville can be a fun atmosphere, but it is a tough scene when you're alone — and not a likely place to meet the person of your dreams.

Hang in there, lonely people. You're not alone.

P.S. Still Waiting, what are you doing Saturday night?
S.C., K-State student

DEAR S.C.,
Please read on.

DEAR CASSANDRA,

This is in reference to the "singles" scene. I, too, believe it is hard to meet someone who I would be interested in dating. I feel there are many out there who feel the same way. A lot of those students can be found at the bars hoping to meet someone special, but it is difficult to do so in that kind of atmosphere.

For quite some time now I have been wanting to start some kind of dating service for college students. I would love to hear any input or ideas other students might have about this. If the response is great enough, I have a feeling there will be fewer lonely hearts at K-State.

Signed, Wait No Longer

DEAR WAIT NO LONGER,

What a great idea! I hope you get a terrific response.

DEAR CASSANDRA,

I've been reading your column for a while now, and I've noticed quite a few letters from single, lonely people. I've seen suggestions from getting involved in campus activities to coordinating a singles dance.

Obviously, single people in this town need a social medium where they can meet.

We already have this meeting place established. It doesn't require an entrepreneur to capitalize on a singles dance. It doesn't require people to get involved in academic or social clubs. It also doesn't allow any alcohol, so people who don't enjoy Aggieville can avoid the drunks.

If you like to dance, you're more than welcome to, and if you just want to sit then that's all right, too. There is also no cover charge because our student fees already pay for it. This place is the Union Station at our very own K-State Union.

Union Station was built as a place for students to socialize without having to deal with all of the drinking that takes place in Aggieville. All of the lonely people who keep writing in should consider using this as their singles club. It's free, and it's already established. If you ask me, it sounds like the ideal place.

I offer this invitation to all who are willing to accept it. On the night of Friday, Nov. 13, all of you lonely and single people who are actually looking for a change in your life should come to Union Station.

I don't promise you'll find the perfect partner for yourself, but at least there is potential. As they say, "You can lead a horse to water but you can't force it to drink."

If you don't choose to come, then that is your choice. Just remember that life is what you make of it, and sitting at home will seldom help you meet new, interesting people.

Signed, Solutions Are Us.

DEAR SOLUTIONS,

If my mail is any indication, Union Station should be packed Friday night. Have a good time!

Trade war sparks EC to prepare retaliation the dangers inherent in the present situation."

The statement made no mention of trade retaliation, but both Vitalone and French Foreign minister Roland Dumas told reporters the EC states had formally requested the EC Commission draw up an American-goods hit list.

Last week, the Commission said any trade retaliation would be proportional to any U.S. sanctions.

France has urged other EC members to remain tough with Washington, which last week said it would impose stiff tariffs on wines — mostly French — if the farm-subsidies issue was not resolved within 30 days. The tariffs would begin Dec. 5.

"We cannot have a constructive dialogue where there are threats of retaliation," said Bruno Durieux, deputy French minister for foreign trade.

The Bush administration vowed to impose sanctions on $300 million worth of goods exported to the United States.

The two sides failed to break an impasse over EC subsidies given to European farmers producing competitively priced grain products.

The dispute over subsidies is holding up an overall accord between the 105 nations of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

"The American attitude ... is a very serious obstacle to the GATT negotiations," Durieux said.

Durieux said France was not alone in its refusal for concessions to Washington. "They want us to think it is, but it's not," he told reporters.

The American tariffs are largely targeted at French white wines, a move to hurt France. A powerful farm lobby, it is the most resistant to any effort to slash subsidies to the EC's 9 million farmers.*

An Irish official said Ireland would side with France on resisting giving concessions to the U.S., but it would not go along with French demands for instant retaliation.

Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo said Italy supports the French position, but he said the EC hoped to avoid starting its relations with a new U.S. president on a bad footing.

Ensemble to perform

Mortenson says the concert offers a wide variety of music.

"We chose music from the Renaissance era, some Baroque and some familiar contemporary works," Mortenson said.

He said the music is designed to show the sound of the brass, which is often covered up in an orchestra.

"We get to play music that we otherwise wouldn't get to play," Erker said.

The brass ensemble will be joined by organist Mary Ellen Sutton, professor of music, for a number.

"The organ will be rockin', it's an excellent piece," Mortenson said.

The Kansas Music Educators Association has invited the ensemble to play at its In-Service Conference in February.

It also received an invitation to play a recital at the New York Brass Conference in April.

"It's a great accomplishment," Mortenson said.

Besides the conference recitals, the ensemble will play at St. Bartholomew's Church in New York City for its Palm Sunday service.

FFA may pull out of K.C.

facilities, safety and meals," said Larry Case, FFA national adviser, in a news conference after the meeting.

Earlier this year, FFA said it might consider offers from Indianapolis or other cities unless Kansas City could provide lower hotel rates, more meeting space, $365,000 more annually to help pay convention expenses and other incentives.

That prompted Mayor Emanuel Cleaver to convene the task force that presented its plan Monday.

Included in the group was Crosby Kemper, chairman of United Missouri Bancshares Inc., who made an offer last month to guarantee the $365,000 if city businesses failed to come up with the amount.

"We take most of the hotel rooms around this area, and I think it would be expeditious to our convention if you had more hotel space," Case said, though he and others declined to provide other specifics of FFA requests or the city's offer.

Cleaver said, "We believe we have placed all the signs on the table for the FFA to see that Kansas City is interested in continuing and to provide whatever we can to attract that organization until the year 2003."

The annual convention, which attracts thousands of youths from across the country, is estimated to bring $14 million in business to the city. This year's convention begins Thursday.

"The National FFA Organization has been coming to Kansas City for its annual convention ever since its beginning 65 years ago," Case said.

But he said the organization had begun a reassessment of its operations and was seeking the best competitive convention values.

Case said the group had not received detailed offers from other cities.

He said the FFA had made only informal inquiries among its members on where they preferred to have their conventions.

The National FFA Organization was known as the Future Farmers of America, but it changed its name to reflect its changing membership.

24-hour imprisonment staged to raise awareness

Members of Arnold Air Society will sit in a bamboo cage until 11:11 a.m. today in the K-State Union to symbolize prisoner of war conditions.

The bamboo cage is an event of the Arnold Air Society's second annual POW/MIA Week.

The purpose of the week is to increase awareness of prisoners of war and those missing in action.

"When you see someone sitting in a bamboo cage, it makes you a little more aware of them," said Nikki Frantz, freshman in pre-nursing. "You have a little more respect."

An Arnold Air Society member will be in the cage until 11:11 a.m., with a guard present at all times.

This time represents the 11th month, 11th day and 11th hour in which the armistice was signed to end World War I.

Kristi Brown, junior in management, said last year the cage was successful in increasing people's awareness of POWs and MIAs.

The bamboo cage was borrowed from a Junction City VFW. It has been decorated with the dog tags of missing soldiers and POWs.

An information table is near the cage, and POW/MIA T-shirts are on sale for $9 to raise funds for the Grimm Scholarship and to raise awareness of POW/MIA Week.

Judge overrules gay ban

Navy ordered to reinstate honorably discharged sailor

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES — A federal judge Tuesday ruled the Navy's ban on homosexuals was unconstitutional and reaffirmed his order that it reinstate a sailor discharged because he is gay.

U.S. District Judge Terry Hatter Jr. ordered the Navy to reinstate Keith Meinhold of Palo Alto to his previous position by Thursday morning. He said if the Navy refused, it would be banned from filing future motions in the case.

"This is not a military dictatorship. It is not the former Soviet socialist republic. Here, the rule of law applies to the military ... even to the commander-in-chief," Hatter said.

In issuing the order, Hatter reaffirmed a preliminary injunction and rejected a Navy offer that would have reinstated Meinhold, but fell short of restoring him to his position as a sonar crew instructor.

Hatter agreed, however, to a government request for a hearing Monday to hear arguments to reconsider the original injunction.

He said the ban violated the Constitution's equal protection clause and provisions that prohibit punishing a particular class of people.

Citing the military's ban on homosexuals, the Navy involuntarily but honorably discharged Meinhold in August after he said on national television that he was gay.

▶ AXI GETS PROBATION

CLAYTON, Mo. (AP) — A judge Tuesday put rock star Axl Rose on probation for two years and ordered him to donate $50,000 to five social-service organizations for touching off a riot at a July 2, 1991, Guns N' Roses concert.

Rose, who wasn't required to be in court, was found guilty of property damage and assault. Terms of probation allow him to continue touring.

Britain to investigate arms sales to Iraq

"There have been some extraordinary stories about this matter."

PRIME MINISTER
JOHN MAJOR

Trade minister has said Cabinet knew of embargo violation

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LONDON — The government on Tuesday announced an inquiry into charges that Margaret Thatcher's Cabinet secretly promoted arms sales to Iraq until within weeks of Baghdad's invasion of Kuwait in August 1990.

The furor erupted after three executives of Iraqi-owned Matrix Churchill Corp. were acquitted Monday of selling arms-making machine tools to Iraq between 1988 and 1990, in violation of an arms embargo.

Prosecutors dropped the charges after former Trade Minister Alan Clark acknowledged the government had encouraged the exports.

A British secret service agent testified that Matrix Churchill's former managing director, Paul Henderson, had been a spy for MI6, the external intelligence agency.

The opposition has charged that Thatcher knew of the arms sales and that the government was prepared to let Henderson and two other businessmen go to jail to cover up intelligence activities.

In a statement after the trial, Henderson's lawyer said Henderson had been told by Clark in 1988 that British and U.S. policy were coordinated, and that Henderson had no doubt the information he provided was shared with the CIA and available to the White House.

Testimony at the trial also indicated the United States would have known about the sales.

U.S. Congressional critics have charged that the Bush administration was aware Iraq was getting Western help in rearming after the Iran-Iraq war but did nothing to stop it.

"There have been some extraordinary stories about this matter," Prime Minister John Major told the House of Commons on Tuesday. "I agree they must be clarified beyond any measure of

ON THE AGENDA

Homecoming '92 events scheduled

Tradition brings mixed reactions from student body

SCOTT OBERKROM

Homecoming 1992 — the Cats play the Cowboys. Alumni will travel miles to relive the heritage they left behind.

The week begins with the Crazy Cat Kick-Off at 3 p.m. Monday in Weber Arena. Wildcat football coach Bill Snyder and "Voice of the Wildcats" Mitch Holthus will participate in a rally at noon Wednesday in the K-State Union.

Lynn Dickey, former Wildcat football star, will be the grand marshal for the homecoming parade Saturday morning.

Other special events this homecoming week include a Landon Lecture given by CNN anchor Bernard Shaw and the election of two new Student Ambassadors.

The traditional bonfire, pep rally and student group competitions will also be a part of this year's homecoming.

Is the student body excited? Is it all it is cracked up to be? Do students still bleed Purple?

There are differing opinions. But for the most part, students said homecoming is still a significant part of the college experience.

"It is a fun time," said Chris

Nichols, junior in psychology and member of Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity. "It is a big social event."

But it's not just a greek thing. Michelle Kuhns, senior in physical education, said it's something for her, too.

"When I think of homecoming, I think of floats, fluid and fun," Kuhns said.

Not everyone's quite so excited, though.

Angie Smith, senior in education, said, "I don't think that it is a big deal. They just parade around and show off their floats."

Smith is an avid football fan and attends all the football games, but she has never been involved in homecoming.

"I don't think that it is very publicized," Smith said.

She said if there were more opportunities for individuals to participate, she might feel differently.

Stacey Heidrick, sophomore in business and member of Kappa Kappa Gamma, said she likes homecoming because it raises pride in K-State.

Some students said since this year's homecoming is a little late in the season, support may not be as high as in years past.

"There is not much excitement, because it is late in the season. But when it comes closer to time, excitement will increase," Nichols said.

SEXUAL VIOLENCE

Policy protects victims

JENNIFER BEALS

Collegian

The issue of sexual violence on college campuses has gained awareness in recent years — it's no longer such a taboo subject.

The University has addressed sexual violence with a policy prohibiting it.

In November 1989, President Jon Wefald approved the policy, which states: "No form of sexual violence will be tolerated or condoned at Kansas State University. This policy thus prohibits not only those acts commonly understood to constitute 'sexual assault,' but all attempts to coerce sexual activity as well."

The policy outlines prohibited acts, the judgment process, confidentiality and the right to appeal beyond the administrative process. It also states that if sexual violence has occurred, "sanctions may range from admonishment to dismissal."

Judy Davis, policy task force member and director of the Women's Resource Center, said the policy is a constant reminder of the importance of reporting acquaintance rape.

"The policy represents the University statement of an expectation of behavior among students," Davis said. "I was really interested in the policy, given the fact acquaintance rapes go unreported, and victims don't talk to anyone for a period of time."

"It affords a way to seek justice. So, the policy speaks to the phenomenon of acquaintance rape," she said.

Davis said another important aspect of the Cease-fire no peace guarantee

Past Bosnian truces had little effect on fighting

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SARAJEVO, Bosnia-Herzegovina — Bosnia's warring factions signed an unconditional cease-fire Tuesday, but it was uncertain whether all had the will or means to end the bloodletting.

The agreement on a Bosnian cease-fire, which was to go into effect at midnight Wednesday, was reached during negotiations among military commanders who have been meeting for two weeks at the Sarajevo airport on a plan to demilitarize the capital.

Several long-term trends argue for an end to the fighting in Bosnia. These include the approach of winter, increasing economic problems and diplomatic isolation in Serbia, and the military losses and lack of supplies and food on the Muslim side.

However, dozens of truces have failed in Bosnia in the past — many within hours —

COLUMNS

IN OUR OPINION

Of Nazism and a Neo-Germany

By the Collegian Editorial Board

THE ISSUE

The rise of Neo-Nazism in Germany has raised considerable concern both there and here in America.

WE SUGGEST

The supporters of democracy and harmony continue to rally against the rise of Neo-Nazism.

Nov. 9, 1938, and Nov. 9, 1989, seem far apart.

But this Nov. 9, these two dates were as close together as any today and tomorrow.

The second date, the fall of the Berlin Wall, is the reason many people in Germany and around the world fear a repetition of the first date, the Kristallnacht (Crystal Night) in Germany.

Kristallnacht was the beginning of the Holocaust that caused the death of six million European Jewish people.

Ever since democracy arose in what was former East Germany, anti-semitism against foreigners has increased more and more each day.

When facing the reality of capitalism and its high unemployment rate, younger people in particular have found a new way to vent their frustrations — foreigner-hunting.

More than 1,600 attacks against immigrants and asylum-seekers have occurred, and Neo-Nazi violence has caused 11 deaths already this year.

Incidents of beating-up foreigners and attacking asylum shelters with stones has haunted the nation for weeks. Just as it did 54 years ago.

But this time, 350,000 people went to the streets to demonstrate against the right-wing movement in Germany. These people used the power of democracy to make their voices heard.

The problems of racism and anti-semitism are not German problems. They are global issues.

Kurds have suffered in Turkey. South Africa is still years away from solving its apartheid situation. And the United States was reminded with the Rodney King case and its aftermath this year.

The massive right-wing appearance in Germany scares many people. But the even more numerical participation of anti-demonstrators overpowers the Neo-Nazis.

That's the way it should be, everywhere around the world. Go out and raise your voice for freedom of all races.

The wrath against gays is a wrath against humanity

As a global race, we are all victims of misunderstanding

When I was a kid my family and I used to go skiing every winter in Colorado. It was there that I was turned on to John Denver, and I actually touched a cloud.

My memories of Colorado are very precious ones. I look back on them with a great fondness. That is why I will miss Colorado so much.

As I have changed over the years, so too has Colorado. On Nov. 3, the citizens of Colorado passed into law a bill effectively eliminating gays and lesbians from protection against hate crimes and discrimination.

A similar bill debated in Oregon was defeated by only six percentage points. The bill would have added to the state's constitution an amendment stating homosexuality is morally wrong. It would have also mandated the censoring of any positive portrayal of homosexuality.

The gay community is part of the character of the United States. We are neighbors, friends, co-workers and family members. Lawyers, teachers, parents and artists.

The resounding message this election year is that we as individuals are defined by the people we are attracted to. This type of legislation devalues the diversity of us all. Our sexuality is not based on the gender of whom we sleep with. Sex is more than a physical act. It is love and affection. It is with whom we are most comfortable. Who we connect with. It is not just who we sleep with.

But this anti-gay legislation is only partly about sexual orientation. On a larger issue is the type of society we want to live in. If individuals are granted rights based on a list of attributes, then we must question the value of any individual.

This is not a "gay issue" — it is a human issue. We are not talking about special rights and privileges. We are talking about the rights and privileges of everyone.

If freedom from hate and discrimination is not inherent in all of us, than none of us are truly free. To legislate rights and freedoms to some and not all is to allow boundaries and conditions to be established. Who can say your head is not the next one on the religious right's chopping block?

Walking to class Election Day, I read an article about Oregon's Ballot Measure 9. In the article the Reverend Fred Phelps said homosexuality was a choice, and it was morally wrong. I tossed the paper aside, much the way the people of this country are tossing away the lives of so many of its citizens.

I feel sorry for weak and fearful people like Rev. Phelps who hide behind limited selections of the Bible. I know people who read the Bible and are good people. They don't hate because of sexual orientation. They understand that the "decision" to be gay is no more a decision than the one heterosexuals make to be with members of the opposite sex.

The Bible is, at its very core, a book of philosophy. Read it and use it if you want. Incorporate bits and pieces. Just don't try and make me, or anyone else, live by what you read in a book.

Our rights as individuals should not be a matter of public scrutiny. Tolerance and freedom — isn't that what the United States is about? You don't have to be gay to be threatened by this type of legislation. You just have to be human.

If you believe in your rights as an individual — as a human being — speak out against this injustice. Don't go skiing in Colorado this winter. Don't buy a Denver Broncos T-shirt. Don't give your money to a state that doesn't give everyone a chance to be themselves.

We are not gay or straight, black or white, women or men. We are human beings breathing the same air, inhabiting the same planet and passing through life together.

READERS WRITE

VETERAN'S DAY

Chapter says goodbye to model of leadership

Editor,

To Bill Arck of Manhattan. At the chapter #344 meeting on Sept. 28, we discussed your letter of remembrance and "pulling back." I don't think anyone present failed to understand, but the outcome of the discussion was a recognition of our great need to express appreciation to you. I have been asked to write to you to express that. True, I volunteered, but I was also asked.

The usual format for citations and letters of appreciation is to make them litanies of accomplishments, credits and other "ticket punches." Your contributions to this chapter, to Vietnam veterans in general and to public understanding of Vietnam veterans and the Vietnam War could easily fill several letters.

Your contributions include involvement in chapter #344 from its earliest stages, your promotion of the K-State Vietnam Memorial, your coordination of Vietnam veterans in K-State history classes, your faithful involvement in chapter activities and your editing of the chapter newsletter "Incoming."

I think your importance to the chapter, and to each of us individually, is very clear (though each of us would probably articulate it a little differently). You seem to have known from the start that the Vietnam War was in some way essentially different from our nation's other wars, and the war's conclusion left its veterans in a significantly different position than the veterans of other wars.

You seemed aware that the only way we, the veterans, can make some sense of this significant interval in our lives, integrate it and go on, is to do it together. We, more than veterans of any other war, have been driven into isolation from society at large, and you sensed or knew the importance of our simply finding one another and being together. I might, in a brotherly way, disagree with your political opinions or your historical conclusions; but diversity doesn't mean we are not together.

No single person can sustain the sort of intensity with which you have contributed, and no one should. We welcome your continued involvement at whatever level you find comfortable, and we hope that we have learned enough from you to sustain a sense of mission and to continue the chapter. Because it is only across a bridge such as this chapter that most of us can fully and finally "come home."

BICYCLISTS

Respect might end Biker-Walker War

Editor,

Recently, there has been a seemingly large outcry with regards to bicyclists riding on campus sidewalks. There have been many complaints from both pedestrians and bicyclists.

The basics seem to be that pedestrians are complaining because bikers ride unsafely on the sidewalks, and cyclists are complaining because pedestrians are walking on bike lanes (where available), and there are times when they have to ride on the sidewalks.

Let's face it folks, we will always have these occurrences. However, the situation does need to improve from both sides. Everybody has, at one time or another, been on each side. Problems could be solved by one basic principle — mutual respect.

Cyclists: Look to the streets and bike lanes when you can. If you absolutely have to ride on the sidewalks, be courteous. Remember that the sidewalks are only a few feet wide, and swerving around people — particularly at high speeds — scares them. Slow down and always be ready to stop. It's just like if you were riding down the street during rush-hour traffic.

Pedestrians: Please realize there are times when bicyclists need to ride on the sidewalk. If you know cyclists are coming, make sure they have room to pass, just as you would another pedestrian. And please, do not walk on the bike lanes. Most cyclists take the attitude that if they are going to be held responsible for a collision on the sidewalks, pedestrians should be held responsible for a collision on the bike lanes. Especially since most of the lanes are very close to the sidewalks.

If everyone follows these simple rules, tensions will be eased. Yes, it will take some effort from everyone. But after a short time, it will become second nature. And we cannot rely on ticketers or police officers to make these changes work. They will only occur when each individual makes the decision to change.

FOOTBALL

Maybe it's time for police and guard dogs

Editor,

Last Thursday, the Cats had great national exposure. The ESPN folks were very complimentary of the team and the University until the end of the game. Then, we see the fools tear down the goal posts. You children looked like a bunch of imbeciles. All of the positive things were ripped away by criminals. So much for putting the University in a positive light.

In the future, I hope K-State hires the police and a German shepherd to control you. Secondly, I will recommend the costs of this be paid by the student activity fund. So, you all get to pay for the jerks. Finally, I hope that President Jon Wefald and the K-State Police study the ESPN tapes and pick out a few crooks to prosecute to the fullest.

Way to go, kids. You made the whole University look bad.

MORE FOOTBALL

Ed board the word on crowd's misbehavior

Editor,

I just finished reading Scott Swift's scathing attack on the Collegian Editorial Board for "whining" about the tearing down of the goal posts in last Thursday's football game.

To begin with, I wholeheartedly agree with the Collegian's condemnation of actions that do nothing to enhance the moral of the football team but do go a long way toward draining all of our pocketbooks. Mr. Swift's parents are obviously paying his way and have failed to teach him financial responsibility. If he had spent his own hard-earned money paying athletic fees, I'm sure he would be somewhat more concerned about how they are spent.

But what really bothered me is the fact that Mr. Swift claims to be majoring in secondary education. I have two sons, one of whom will be entering middle school next year. I certainly hope that Mr. Swift is never one of his teachers. My kids don't need to be taught that kind of irresponsible behavior.

UPC FILMS

Door Opening 101 in order for moviegoer

Editor,

I would like to respond to some of the facts left out of John Husband's letter concerning UPC films and the status of the theater doors.

Thanks to Husband for bringing the locked-door policy to light. One fact Husband failed to note is that it is physically impossible to be locked into the K-State Union Forum Hall. The doors can only be locked from the outside, never the inside. The reason the doors are kept shut are to bar outside noises from the Union from disturbing customers watching the movie.

I understand the closing mechanisms of "door knob" and "the latch" are difficult to grasp, but even the ape creatures of the Indus are able to open an unlocked door. Exiting Forum Hall requires nothing more than a) twisting a knob and b) opening a door.

Because of a minor three-minute projectionist error, Husband demanded a refund. When a refund wasn't immediately available, he demanded candy bars from the concessions instead of his $1.75.

Even though the movie "became a severe case of indigestion," as he said in his letter, I guess his stomach wasn't too upset to down a few Almond Joys.

30 music channels added to cable wire

TCI offers tuner for cable radio, expands selections

DAN GRAFEL
Collegian

Thirty music channels are now available through Manhattan's cable TV wire.

Barry Metcalf, marketing director for TCI of Kansas, said a new tuner, similar to a cable box, connects the cable music to the stereo.

"This is doing for stereo what cable did for TV. It's expanding it from four or five channels to 30," he said.

Metcalf said the types of channels include classical, country, reggae, oldies rock, folk rock, popular, heavy metal, rap and alternative.

"I hate to admit it, but I've become a show-tune junkie," he said.

Metcalf said the service has been available in limited quantity since June, but in a couple of weeks TCI will be starting a full-scale marketing campaign.

He said he has been using Manhattan as a test market for all 17 Kansas cities served by TCI.

Shannon Metcalf, junior in journalism and mass communications, was one of the 5,000 cable subscribers to receive a direct mail flier as part of the test.

He has had his DMX tuner for about a month.

"It's well worth the money. I can listen to the kind of music I like without a bunch of talk and commercials thrown in," he said.

Barry Metcalf said the subscription requires basic cable already in place and costs about $5 a month for those who already have a cable box.

The cost is $10 a month for those who have to rent a box. For another $3, a "silent DJ" remote is available.

Metcalf said the remote displays the title, artist, album and songwriter for the song playing.

He said the music comes from Atlanta, where the programmers have access to 400,000 titles.

Shannon Metcalf said he uses a variety of channels. He said he listens to the chamber-music channel while studying, but he also listens heavy-metal or album rock a lot.

He said he thinks the music is kept fairly current, and he rarely hears music repeated in the same day.

Mike Tema, program director for KQLA-FM 103.9 radio, said he didn't think the new cable system would create problems for local radio stations.

"It may have a little bit of an effect, but it won't be a big competitor as far as ratings go," he said.

Barry Metcalf also said he didn't think it would hurt radio. He said he hasn't had any negative response from radio stations.

State Department official dismissed

Pre-election search for passport records prompts Bush's action

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Seeking to end a simmering political embarrassment, President Bush on Tuesday dismissed the State Department official who initiated a pre-election search for passport records of Gov. Bill Clinton and Ross Perot.

Bush telephoned Acting Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger and accepted Eagleburger's recommendation that Assistant Secretary of State Elizabeth Tamposi be relieved of her duties, department spokesman Richard Boucher said.

Other officials said Bush's call was prompted by a story in Tuesday's editions of the Washington Post alleging that, after searching files for information on Clinton, department officials looked for material on Perot as well.

Eagleburger ordered an investigation Oct. 19 after press reports of the search of Clinton's files. It was later disclosed a search of the files of Clinton's mother also had been ordered.

Suspicion about the department's motives were heightened because the Bush campaign escalated efforts to discredit Clinton by citing his draft history and his role as an anti-war activist in Britain.

Perot press secretary Sharon Holman had no comment, but the Post quoted Perot as denouncing the search as "a gross abuse of federal power."

"Somebody ought to hold them accountable for it," Perot told the Post.

In Little Rock, Ark., Clinton spokesman George Stephanopoulos said, "Clearly this is a matter of serious concern. ... There was a lot of abuse of power during this election."

"This is a good step," Stephanopoulos said of Tamposi's dismissal. But, he added, "We need a full report."

"Somebody ought to hold them accountable for it."

Grissom charges affirmed

But court asks for resentencing on 6 different counts

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — The Kansas Supreme Court today affirmed the triple murder and related convictions of Richard Grissom, but remanded his case back to Johnson County District Court for resentencing on six of the counts.

The court, in a 142-page opinion authored by Justice Bob Abbott, affirmed the convictions on all counts, as well as his four consecutive life sentences. The high court ordered that he be resentenced on six other charges, two for aggravated burglary and four for robbery.

Grissom was convicted of three counts of first-degree murder and one count of aggravated kidnapping. The convictions arose from the June 1989 disappearance of three Johnson County women.

Missing and presumed dead are Joan Butler, Overland Park, and Christine Rusch and Theresa Brown, who shared an apartment in Lenexa.

In their appeal, defense attorneys contended that the prosecution failed to establish that any of the murders occurred because the bodies of the victims were never found.

Abbott said the deaths of the

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Gallon has chance at career rushing mark

"I'm just letting things happen day by day and taking things in stride."

ERIC GALLON

Senior needs 309 yards to top Wildcat record

STEVE ROCK
Collegian

Eric Gallon is back. The senior Wildcat running back broke loose for 164 rushing yards last Thursday night against the Iowa State Cyclones. It was his best performance of the season.

Gallon's performance, which was the second-best rushing game of any Big Eight runner this season, moved him into sole possession of second place on the K-State career rushing chart. He now has 1,874 career yards, second only to Isaac Jackson.

And Gallon is just 309 yards away from being the leading all-time Wildcat rusher.

"I'm not even thinking about that," he said. "I'm just letting things happen day by day and taking things in stride."

During the Cats' four-game losing streak, those strides were few and far between.

In losses to Kansas, Colorado and Oklahoma,

Gallon had a total of just 26 rushes. Against Iowa State, he had 24.

Gallon started the season with 315 yards in the first three games, all victories. He averaged 4.5 yards per rush and was leading the Big Eight in rushing.

Then came Kansas.

Gallon was held to 11 yards on nine carries in the 31-7 loss to the Jayhawks. That kicked off a four-game losing streak for the Cats. Sandwiched in between three conference losses, K-State lost 28-16 to Utah State. Gallon carried 21 times for 74 yards in that contest.

"We've always wanted to run the ball," Wildcat coach Bill Snyder said. "When you have 40-some snaps in one ball game, that's about 50 percent of what you would normally have."

"Everybody's numbers go down."

Gallon was no exception. In the three conference losses, he had a total of 66 rushing yards.

Then came Iowa State.

Gallon made his presence known early, gaining 18 yards on his first three carries, including a 4-yard touchdown run that gave the Cats an early 12-0 lead. Later in the contest, he broke open a 56-yard touchdown run, the longest jaunt of his career.

"We're blocking our running game a little bit better," Snyder said. "The offensive line has made some strides in the last two weeks, and that certainly helps our running game."

"Eric would be the first one to tell you that he's not going anywhere without some help."

And Gallon said the improved play of the offensive line has indeed sparked his recent success.

"I'm just hoping the guys in front keep doing their jobs," he said. "They're the ones who are making it happen."

This week's Wildcat opponent, the 1-8 Missouri Tigers, is giving up 233.1 rushing yards per game. The Tigers are ranked last in the Big Eight, and 102nd in the nation, against the run.

But for Gallon, he said, this week is just another matter of getting back to work.

"I'm just going to go out, play the game and hope everything takes care of itself."

VOLLEYBALL

Struggling KU next for Cats

BRIAN ANDERSON
Collegian

Kansas has beaten K-State in many big-time sports in 1992.

The Jayhawk men's and women's basketball teams swept the Cats earlier this year, and the KU football team overpowered K-State last month.

The volleyball team attempts to even the score and get K-State a victory against Kansas as the 7-19 Cats take on the 18-13 Jayhawks Wednesday night at Allen Fieldhouse in Lawrence.

K-State lost to Kansas Sept. 30 in four games at Ahearn Field House in Manhattan.

Coach Patti Hagemeyer said she anticipates a Kansas team on the decline.

"Kansas has been struggling in the conference," she said of the 2-7 Hawks. "I assume that they have improved since we played them."

Both teams are coming off victories. Since beating the Wildcats, the Hawks got their first conference win last Wednesday against Missouri.

K-State won last Sunday, beating Tulsa in three games. The Cats have won two of their last four matches.

"I feel real good about two out of the four matches," Hagemeyer said. "Whether we capitalize on it depends on tomorrow night."

In their last meeting, the Cats controlled the first game before losing the next three.

One problem for Hagemeyer is maintaining intensity.

"The intensity has to be there no matter if the match goes three, four or five games," she said. "Any lapse will hurt us. There is not a drill to work on keeping intensity. Unfortunately, the

Trout fishing in Arkansas during the elections

Rambler Restaurant, Nevada, Mo., Halloween day: Coffee and cinnamon roll are consumed halfway to Calico Rock, where we will fish for trout from boats.

I am sitting at center table with Uncle E, Uncle Richard, Dad and Cousin Joe. The rolls are oddly shaped, with frosting ladled over them instead of baked-in.

Our waitress is surly.

It is raining as we sip our coffee and discuss the likelihood of trout fishing so late in the year. It is cold outside the Rambler, and the radio weather forecasts have mentioned snow.

ED SKOOG

Holiday Inn, Mountain Home, Ark., Halloween night: It is misting, and I am barefoot in the parking lot listening to a band play at the Sly Fox Lounge. The noise blasts out through the glass doors. I can see costumed Arkansians hurdle past the windows, dancing with each other.

These are not trout people. These people are unaware that giant trout swim in the water they drink.

Brother Peter DVM met us earlier in the parking lot. He was waiting for us, sitting in his truck, reading the USA Today. Now he sleeps in Room 138, to which I have a key. It is late and Halloween.

Bill Clinton, Little Rock, Ark., Halloween Night: He does not know much about the giant trout that live in Northern Arkansas, the state of which he is governor. The election is four days away, and he is nervous. He would be better off giving up politics and taking up trout fishing.

Jenkins Boat Dock, Calico Rock, Ark., the first day of November: Uncle E has come to this river often. I will be fishing with him this morning. He is in the front of the boat, I am in the middle, and the guide is in the back, with his hand on the motor. Danny, co-owner of the dock, is untying us from the post, and we are floating away.

"What the hell — who put all this mud in the water?" Uncle E asks. The guide says that the last few days of rain have washed tons of leaves and soil down out of the creeks. It is a shame. The water is best clear, as trout feed by sight.

Still, we manage to catch several. Every relative catches his limit. It is a good day. At lunch, we sit on a sandbar and eat trout from a foil wrapping. It is hot, and there are onions inside.

What we use: Zebco "33" spinning rods. Six-foot poles. Six-pound test line. Half-foot silver spoons. No. 2 barbed hooks. Worms. Living oxidizing worms. Artificial salmon eggs that are light pink. Saliva.

Second day: The mud has gotten worse. The White is not white, it is brown as the Kaw. I expect the extinct small mouth bass and catfish to come back. They used to be in this river.

They were there before the three dams on the White were built. It was warm water. Trout were still thousands of miles away, in Vermont and Idaho. The dams let out water 150 feet deep. Cold trout water.

The ride back: It is election day in Arkansas, and an Arkansas governor will be elected. We climb onto the Ozark Plateau, and after hours of driving through snow, we arrive in Monett for lunch at the Dairy Queen. Our cooler is full of fish. Clear plastic bags of champion rainbow trout with their eyes frozen and looking out.

Home: It is dark and cold. All of my roommates are drunk or asleep. The cat jumps off the couch and pads into the kitchen. I put my trout in the freezer and go to sleep.

TENNIS

Cat netters head to Regionals

TONYA FOSTER
Collegian

K-State tennis players will compete in the first round of the ITA Rolex Regional Championships today in Omaha, Neb.

"This is the largest tournament our players will compete in," K-State coach Steve Bietau said. "This is the only tournament when the region is all together."

The tournament is one of six regional tournaments in the nation. The finalist in singles will compete in the National Indoors in Minneapolis in February.

There are 92 singles players and 44 doubles teams entering the tournament.

"The tournament is big because the top two places will get to compete in the indoor national," Bietau said. "There will be a lot of good teams and players."

Senior Susana Labrador is seeded seventh in the singles bracket. She is the only K-State singles player seeded.

Labrador will play doubles with Suzanne Sim. They are seeded 12th.

Sim said teaming up in previous matches will be an advantage for the senior tandem.

"Playing in all of the tournaments together has helped us, and I think we're ready for this tournament," she said.

Sim will also be playing singles along with Maria Uson and Martine Shrubsole. Uson and Shrubsole will be competing as the second doubles pair at the tournament.

Switching from outdoor surfaces to the indoor carpet, Labrador said, will affect her game.

"Being indoors, it is fast, which is an advantage to serve and volley," she said. "Since I've grown up on clay, which is the opposite, being slower, I'll be working on my speed."

The tournament runs from 8 a.m. to midnight each day. Players may compete in as many as four matches a day.

"Since I will be playing three to four matches a day, it will put me to the test," Labrador said. "This is the last tournament of the fall season, so it is important."

Labrador has a bye in the first round of singles play. Sim plays Bindi Thomas of Boise State.

Uson competes against Weber State's Susie Enga, and Shrubsole will face Karen McIntosh of Colorado.

"Kansas and BYU will be tough competition," Sim said. "I've been playing well lately. I just hope that I can get over the hump. I hope that I can do what I do in practice."

Labrador and Sim play Zarina Galvan and Tina Coutretsis of Nebraska in the first round. Uson and Shrubsole are paired up against Chris Bowers and Angie Moore of Colorado.

"It's the last opportunity to measure our progress of this fall," Bietau said.

SPORTS DIGEST

►ECK WINS CY YOUNG

OAKLAND, Calif. (AP) — Dennis Eckersley, who had a career-high 51 saves for the Oakland Athletics this season, on Tuesday became the first reliever since Detroit's Willie Hernandez to win the American League Cy Young award.

He received 19 of 28 first-place votes from a panel consisting of two writers in each of the 14 league cities. With three seconds and three thirds, Eckersley totaled 107 points.

Jack McDowell of the Chicago White Sox was a distant second with two firsts and 51 points, followed by Roger Clemens of Boston with four firsts and 48 points.

Hernandez won the Cy Young in 1984. Milwaukee's Rollie Fingers (1981) and New York's Sparky Lyle (1977) are the only other relievers to claim the AL pitching honor.

The 38-year-old right-hander converted all but three save opportunities as the Athletics won their fourth AL West title in five years.

►GIANTS TO STAY AT BAY

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz. (AP) — The Giants are staying in San Francisco, and Tampa Bay struck out again in its quest for a major-league team.

Baseball owners, in a move they said stressed stability but was sure to spark a legal battle, decisively rejected Tuesday a $115-million deal to move the Giants to St. Petersburg, Fla., even though the best offer to keep the club in San Francisco was $15 million less.

The National League's 9-4 vote against the deal was the first formal rejection of a move that baseball officials could remember.

In all previous instances, shifts were stopped before a vote was taken. It also marked the seventh time the Tampa Bay area had failed in an attempt to land a major-league team.

The deal would have put two NL franchises in Florida and essentially locked up the Southeast for the league.

Working more, playing less

Harvard professor says U.S. employers value longer hours

JANET SATTERLEE
Collegian

"The extent to which all Americans are finding themselves with less leisure time is truly remarkable," said Juliet Schor, professor of economics at Harvard University.

Schor gave the fourth Lou Douglas Lecture of the semester, "Reflections on the Overworked American," Tuesday night in the K-State Union Forum Hall.

She said most Americans work longer hours and have less leisure time than they did 45 years ago.

"The most striking thing about this disappearance of leisure is that it occurred without anyone realizing it," she said.

Schor said the average American is working an additional 160 hours on the job, what she calls an extra month of work.

"Overtime, moonlighting, weeks of work, teen and child labor and women's employment have all increased," Schor said.

One in six employees works more than one job, she said, and one in three Americans works weekends and evenings.

Journalists are calling the current recession a "work-hard recession," Schor said. Companies are laying off workers, throwing a larger share of the work onto the remaining employees.

"Businesses are convinced of the equation that long equals better," Schor said. "They have the idea that the worker who spends longer hours working is the most loyal, worthy and productive to the company."

"The worker who takes off at 5 o'clock, doesn't work weekends and has a limited week schedule will find himself or herself in jeopardy when layoffs begin."

There is a bias against salaried workers, she said, because employers think every additional hour they work is a free hour and doesn't have to be tracked like the time of hourly workers.

Companies are concerned with output increases and not paying overtime, she said.

"The salaried worker is what I call an elastic worker," Schor said. "They just keep on stretching."

The trend is for employers to demand longer hours for their employees with no options for longer vacations, shorter work hours or paid sabbaticals, Schor said. The only incentive is higher incomes.

EUROPE

Ethnic, religious hatred escalates

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ROME — After vandals desecrated Jewish graves and affixed yellow Stars of David to Jewish-owned storefronts in Italy's capital, angry Jews took matters into their own hands.

Jewish youths attacked the offices of a neo-fascist group, and though no one was injured, the incident provided ugly evidence of the winds of ethnic and religious hatred blowing across Europe.

Italy's past — anti-Jewish laws under fascism foreshadowed the deportation of 8,000 Jews during World War II — made recent episodes particularly worrisome. Adolf Hitler's Nazi regime required Jews to wear yellow stars.

"I was 7 when I saw the yellow star appear for the first time, and I am saddened and surprised to see it reappear so close to the year 2000," Angelo Funaro said at his store in the former Jewish ghetto of Rome.

As the 1990s dawned, news events seemed to point to an era of great promise for Europe. Instead, the decade has seen the rise of nationalism and xenophobia, leading Pope John Paul II to recently declare, "Every form of racism is a sin against God and man."

Right-wing attacks in Germany have spread fear among hundreds of thousands of refugees.

Even bleaker, a bloody civil war grinds on in Yugoslavia, where religious and tribal rivalries used to be held in check by Communists.

"European identity is in crisis," said Italian Jewish leader Tullia Zevi. "A white continent is becoming multicultural and multi-ethnic."

Six Asian men have been killed in attacks this year in Britain, where ethnic violence, often by gangs of skinheads, is on the increase.

REVIEW

Chinese culture film's high point

ANDY WOODWARD

Collegian

"The Last Emperor" is a mind-boggling cultural barrage of post-imperial China.

Filmed on location in Beijing and Manchuria, "The Last Emperor" was the first film to be shot inside of the previously restricted Forbidden City, the seat of imperial rule for the past 3,000 years.

The film, starring John Lone, Joan Chen and Peter O'Toole, has a story that revolves around Pu Yi, China's last emperor, who was made emperor in 1908 when he was 3.

His role as ruler is brought to an end in 1912, when China becomes a republic. However, the emperor is allowed to remain in the Forbidden City. Eventually, the ruling government removes him from life within the city's 50-foot thick walls.

Pu Yi adventures outside the walls with his friend, Scottish tutor Reginald Johnston. The emperor tries the life of a Western playboy but is eventually arrested and imprisoned for supposed war crimes.

One of the confusing aspects of the film is its sporadic jumps on the timestream, opening up with Pu Yi's attempted suicide in a prison camp. The film is interwoven with scenes from both Pu Yi's adult imprisonment and his infant godhood.

The cultural benefits, however, are immeasurable and outweigh any confusion. The viewer is privy to things no Westerner had ever set eyes on, and that most Easterners hadn't seen for 3,000 years.

The rites, the ceremonies, the wardrobe and the traditions are all so unlike anything in a Western frame of reference. The movie is really quite an amazing experience.

The scope of "The Last Emperor" is truly panoramic, with a cast including more than 20,000 extras and 60 main characters.

"The Last Emperor" won several Academy Awards, including Best Picture (1987), Best Director for Bernardo Bertolucci, Best Original Score and Best Cinematographer.

One word of warning, however. The film runs 243 minutes. So, for those of you who have trouble sitting still through "Full House," you'd probably have trouble with "The Last Emperor."

SHOWTIME

■ "The Last Emperor" will be at 6:30 and 9:30 p.m. today and Thursday in Union Forum Hall, and at 7 p.m. Friday in the Little Theatre.

Activist up for 3rd appeal in slayings

King videotape has helped Peltier, fiancée says

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ST. PAUL, Minn. — Seventeen years after two FBI agents were killed in a reservation shootout, lawyers still are arguing whether an Indian activist was wrongly convicted.

Supporters say they believe Leonard Peltier's third appeal for a new trial will succeed because the times are different.

But a prosecutor told a panel of the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals Monday that the "facts haven't changed one iota."

Lisa Faruolo-Peltier, one of two people who run the Leonard Peltier Defense Committee, said the videotaped police beating of black motorist Rodney King has helped Peltier's cause.

"We saw a breach of trust between law enforcement and the judiciary with the Rodney King case," said Faruolo-Peltier, the fiancée of the imprisoned activist. "It helped reawaken concern about lawlessness by law enforcement."

A 1992 documentary narrated by Robert Redford and a 1983 book about the events refocused attention on the killings, said Faruolo-Peltier, a paralegal from Lawrence.

Members of Canada's Parliament for the first time intervened Monday on Peltier's behalf in a U.S. court, arguing U.S. government misconduct in the extradition process.

Former U.S. Attorney General Ramsey Clark, who represented Peltier Monday, also argued government misconduct.

Prosecutors still can't prove who killed FBI agents Jack Coler and Ronald Williams June 26, 1975, when they tried to serve a warrant on someone else on the Pine Ridge Reservation near Wounded Knee, S.D., Clark said.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Lynn Crooks, one of the original prosecutors, said the government still believes Peltier fired the fatal shots. The three-judge panel gave no indication when it would rule after the hearing in a courtroom packed with about 120 spectators, including Peltier's relatives.

Faruolo-Peltier said she expected a decision within 30 to 60 days.

Peltier, 48, an Ojibwe and Lakota from North Dakota who is serving two life sentences at Leavenworth, wasn't present.

Program looking for volunteers

K-State's Community Service Program is looking for volunteers for a variety of upcoming service projects.

"All our service opportunities are designed to be a learning experience for the participants," said Tandy Trost, senior in community health and nutrition and a student coordinator for Volunteer Clearinghouse.

"We feel that part of being a community is serving," Trost said.

The program activities include summer teams, international teams, CSP SAVE, Volunteer Clearinghouse, YES tutoring, CSP Homeserve and CSP Mentors.

"All projects are organized by the communities. They tell us what they need, and we do it," Trost said.

CSP Students in Action and Volunteer Efforts group help rural Kansas communities with one-day cleanup or construction projects. The community provides the materials and volunteers, and the CSP staff matches them with student volunteers and transportation.

Five spring projects are planned.

Summer teams and international teams are also recruiting. Summer teams will spend eight weeks in Kansas communities, while international teams will spend eight weeks in Costa Rica, the Dominican Republic or Mexico.

International teams help students gain an understanding of other cultures while they contribute their academic skills to another country's communities, according to CSP literature.

Participants must enroll in a three-credit community service seminar in the spring semester.

"Students will discuss the definition of a community and the concept of citizenship in the class before they go," Trost said.

They will develop a plan to fit the community's needs, with the assistance of a faculty mentor, community leaders, a student coordinator and CSP Director Carol Peak.

"Our role is to meet community needs. Our role is not to tell them what they need, because they already know what they need. So, we just respond to their requests," Peak said.

Four students from different majors make up each team.

Each student will live with a family in the community during the summer project. Knowledge of Spanish is required of students on the international teams.

When students return in the fall, they enroll in a reflection class to evaluate what they learned and discuss problems and successes.

YES Tutoring links students with elementary and secondary students, and CSP Mentors link students with at-risk high-school students.

Another program requiring a two-hour-a-week commitment is CSP Homeserve. In this program, students are paired with elderly residents to provide companionship or help with other household chores.

For more information about the Community Service Program, contact CSP Director Carol Peak at 532-6900.

Hard work expected, Schor says

Because of longer work hours, Schor said, parents and children spend less time together.

However, many people are choosing to downshift by leaving fast-track careers and moving to smaller towns, Schor said.

A 1990 poll taken asked people if they would work one less day per week without pay, she said. Results showed one-half of workers would, cutting incomes by 20 percent.

"While people do not now have much free time, they are clearly articulating a need and desire for it," Schor said.

Schor said workers and special-interest groups must take action on reducing the number of work hours and increasing leisure time.

If the trends continue, she said, the work week may increase to 60 hours, and the gap between poor and rich nations will widen.

"I urge us to forgo our consumerist lifestyle in favor of more free time," Schor said.

"One thing that is very clear is that the decisions about that path need to be made today, and the choices are our choices and should not be left to business and government.

"We have paid a price for prosperity, and that price is our time."

Policy rehabilitative, Davis says

policy is the rehabilitative process it provides for victims.

"It gives either assaulted or abused women a way of fighting back."

"It's a way of saying, 'You know what you did, and you may get away with it, but you and I know it was wrong,'" Davis said. "To give a woman the sense of assertiveness is a healing process."

Susan Scott, associate dean of student life, said people have filed complaints based on the policy, but she declined to say how many had been filed.

She also refused to discuss how people who were found to be in violation of the policy were reprimanded.

One step in handling a complaint is an administrative review, which involves the dean of student life or a designee, two students from the judicial branch of Student Governing Association and a faculty member.

Scott said the faculty member is chosen based on a few guidelines.

"It's at the discretion of the (student life) office," Scott said. "It must be someone who can balance the facts and have the basic understanding of sexual violence."

"No one on the review panel can have knowledge in the way that would bias them," Scott said.

Davis said she wants students to know they have a choice when sexual violence occurs.

"We're here to counsel, not to force someone to make choices," she said.

"We're here to give a copy of the policy, explain the process, go through questioning with the student and to just function in an advocate's way."

"Someone doesn't have to go through this without someone."

Judging team does its best since '76

Bell said K-State also sent three alternates to the contest: Rob Ames, Dan Heinz and Leslie Hedstrom, all juniors in animal sciences and industry. In the alternate competition, Heinz and Hedstrom finished second and ninth, respectively.

"Each competition is a different contest," Bell said. "We evaluate beef, pork and lamb, and evaluate the classes. Then you write your reasons for judging it that way."

Bell said they also do inspections on quality and yield.

Unruh said the success at the American Royal has built excitement among team members.

"This is the best we've done at that meet since 1976," Unruh said. "We plan to keep our success rate high in the future."

Bell said it can be tough to be consistent from year to year because students are only eligible to be on the meats team for one year.

The team will participate in its last competition of the season Nov. 22 at the International Meats Judging Contest in Dakota City, Neb.

The American Royal runs through Nov. 22.

coaches are the last to know."

Senior Kathy Saxton said the team needs to concentrate on the game as well.

"This match is no different from any other match," she said. "We need to stay focused. This is a chance to win against a conference team."

The co-captains for the Cats, Saxton and Stephanie Liester, have turned their game up a notch in several matches.

"Liester has buckled down of late," Hagemeyer said.

"She has demonstrated her leadership qualities. She has turned herself and her game around.

"A player that is realizing what's happening is Saxton," Hagemeyer said.

"It's the end of her career, and she is trying to make things better. But we can't show up with two players."

The Hawks are one notch above the Cats in the Big Eight standings at sixth place with a 2-7 record.

K-State is last in the conference at 0-9.

Kansas holds a 33-31 edge in the series, including a six-game winning streak. K-State's last win in Lawrence was 1988.

Tonight's first game starts at 8.

three women was established because their friends and family never heard from them again, even though all three were close with their families and were considered to be responsible individuals.

Butler was last seen by friends around 4 a.m. June 18, 1989, when she left a girlfriend's apartment to return home.

At about 6 a.m., several withdrawals were made from automatic teller machines from her checking account.

Rusch and Brown disappeared June 26.

Rusch was last seen by acquaintances around 12:30 a.m.

She called her office the next morning and said she was sick.

Brown was last seen at 6 a.m., when she left a friend's to return to hers to get ready for work.

Abbott said that in all three cases, there are additional facts supporting the state's theory that the women were murdered.

Grissom's attorneys Kansas had no jurisdiction in the case, since there is no evidence that murders occurred in that state.

But the high court ruled it is reasonable for a jury to conclude that Grissom had committed criminal acts in Kansas that were part of his overall crime plan.

Grissom will remain in prison on four consecutive life terms.

U.N. special envoy Cyrus Vance and European Community representative Lord Owen welcomed the agreement.

"Only the regular Croatian army has not signed yet, but we expect them to sign in a few days," he said.

ESSENTIALS

Reader wants women 'back in the home where they belong'

YOU'RE ASKING ME?

by Cassandra Duveaux

DEAR CASSANDRA,

I would like to know when the women's liberation movement will come to an end. I can't help but think this movement is just another fad, as it has always been the accepted custom that a woman's place is in the home.

I feel it is traditionally the man's duty to provide for the family. The man was the one who took the responsibility of caring for his wife when the decision to get married was made.

Now, there is no incentive for a man to get a good job, as it is becoming more and more common for both the man and woman to work.

I would like to know what we as men can do to put women back in the home, caring for the kids, cooking and cleaning. The women of today need to learn how to stay home and better serve their husbands.

When will this be accomplished, and what is your opinion on this issue?

Sincerely, K.C.

DEAR K.C.:

Please continue reading.

DEAR CASSANDRA,

I read the letter from the Original D.W., and your response was great.

Men haven't dominated women; women were put here as a companion to men.

The men of the world have not lived up to the partnership. The men don't take care of their women anymore by bringing home the bacon, or by being a father to their children. Most of the time, men don't come home at all.

Women got tired of taking care of these grown children called "men" and started taking care of themselves. Most men don't want a woman, they want a mama.

If men want their women back in the bedrooms and kitchens, then they had better grow up and become the men of the family.

The Liberated Women

DEAR K.C. AND LIBERATED WOMEN:

While it is true there are men out there who need to do some growing up, I believe we all need to do away with some demeaning stereotypes and archaic terminology.

Men do not exist solely for the purpose of "taking care of their women."

Women can take care of themselves quite well, thank you. I certainly don't think women have the duty, as you imply, to be a "companion" to men, or vice versa.

Companionship should be a matter of choice for both men and women.

And being a "man," or being the "man of the family" does not mean being the primary breadwinner, caregiver or family protector. This is an unfair and unrealistic burden to place upon men, just as it is unfair to describe a good wife as being the primary housekeeper, babysitter and cook.

A woman's "place" is certainly not limited to or defined by the bedroom or kitchen.

To use a phrase such as "men want their women" to do this or that is a product of our patriarchal society that has conditioned women (and men) to believe women become the personal property of men upon marriage.

The sooner men and women learn to enter a marriage with respect for the other's unique talents and abilities, the quicker we can leave the "role playing" behind and get on with some real, down-to-earth, male-female interaction that is uplifting for both.

Gay sailor can return to work

Meinhold's lawsuit said the Navy violated his constitutional rights by discharging him because he is gay.

Other homosexuals also have been banned from the military, but President-elect Clinton has said he would try to change that policy.

Meinhold's attorneys said they considered Hatter's action a victory even though it fell short of their request for a finding of contempt.

"The real implication is that by 8 a.m. Thursday, Keith Meinhold will be the first admitted homosexual in the armed forces," attorney Christopher Rudd said.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Marcus Kerner declined to comment, saying he wanted to read the ruling.

Friday, Hatter ordered that Meinhold be reinstated to his job at Moffett Naval Air Station south of San Francisco.

Meinhold was turned away from the base Monday.

"This is so crazy," Meinhold, 30, said Tuesday before the latest order. "I had more faith in the Department of Defense bureaucrats in Washington than this."

In court papers filed Tuesday, the Justice Department argued that Meinhold is no longer in the Navy and the judge did not have authority to reinstate him.

Government lawyers argued that the reinstatement order "flies in the face of present military policy, rules and regulations designed to promote military order and discipline, morale and combat effectiveness."

Ordering Meinhold back to work would disrupt the military and detract from its central purpose, they said in the court papers.

"That's just lawless," said Robert Post, a professor of constitutional law at the University of California, Berkeley.

"It's clear that a court has the authority to order executive department officials to do what needs to be done to comply with the law."

On the strength of the reinstatement order, Meinhold showed up at Moffett on Monday wearing a civilian suit and tie.

He was admitted to the base because he still holds a valid military ID card. On base, he was given a letter saying he would not be reinstated and referring him to the Office of Naval Personnel in Washington.

Sen. Bob Smith, R-N.H., said the U.S. government "has covered up what it knew (about Korean War POWs) through a pattern of denials, misleading statements and, in some cases, lies."

His comments came at the committee's first hearing specifically on U.S. servicemen missing or held prisoner from the Korean War. The committee will go out of existence at the end of December.

Smith released what he said was the most comprehensive compilation of U.S. government policy and intelligence information that has been known about the fate of men missing from the Korean War and what the government did to find out about them.

"It is a document that shows in explicit detail that the government of North Korea did not return a large number of American servicemen at the end of the war, and that some of the men left behind were sent to Communist China and to the Soviet Union," he said.

Officially, 8,177 servicemen never returned from the Korean War. That number includes POWs who died in camps, servicemen lost at sea and buried by Americans in Korea and people whose fates remain unknown.

Smith said internal U.S. government documents show "our government believed men were still alive in captivity, and until only a few months ago, has kept that reality from the American people."

However, a joint American-Russian commission searching for U.S. prisoners of war is finally making some progress despite the efforts of some Russian government elements trying to hinder the process, he said.

The committee's investigator, who has been in Moscow for the last six months, has reported being intentionally stonewalled, he said.

members tangled with Defense Department officials over how many Americans may have been left behind in Korea and how many may have been transferred to China or the Soviet Union.

Alan Ptak, deputy assistant secretary of defense for POW-MIA affairs, told the committee that the Pentagon was still analyzing information received about U.S. servicemen from the Korean War.

The Pentagon has not ruled out the possibility that some may have been transferred to China and the Soviet Union, he said.

However, Paul Cole, a researcher for the Rand Corp. who is under contract to the Defense Department, said he believed a small number — "less than 100 and probably half that" — of Americans captured in Korea were transferred to China and the Soviet Union.

The sales, worth more than $37 million, took place when Thatcher was prime minister.

Major, then a Cabinet minister, succeeded her in November 1990, shortly before the Gulf War allies launched air strikes to drive Iraq from Kuwait.

The Matrix Churchill debacle comes less than a week after Major's government nearly collapsed in a parliamentary battle over a European treaty.

It adds to the misery of a government already in deep trouble over the economy.

Henderson and his colleagues were accused of claiming to the Trade Department that the machine tools were for peaceful purposes when in fact they were designed to make fuses for shells.

Eric Beston, an assistant secretary at the Department of Trade and Industry, testified that the Foreign Office tried to block export licenses in 1989, in part because it had evidence that previous shipments had been turned to military uses.

But Beston said his department successfully argued that Iraq would simply get the same equipment from other countries.

Ceremony pays tribute to veterans

Two observers sheltered by an umbrella listen to retired Army Col. Rex Bartlow give the Veterans Day address Wednesday at the Vietnam Veterans Memorial on campus. Bartlow spoke about the price of freedom.

WADE RAMSEY

Despite the cold and rain, about 100 ROTC cadets and a handful of others gathered Wednesday for a ceremony to honor America's war heroes and observe Veterans Day.

The annual ceremony was at the K-State Vietnam Veterans Memorial east of Danforth Chapel.

About 70 Army ROTC and 30 Air Force ROTC cadets stood at attention during the 15-minute ceremony.

Trumpeter Greg Odom, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine, played the National Anthem to begin the ceremony.

Army Col. Rex Bartlow, a retired veteran of the Korean War, spoke for the next 10 minutes on the pursuit of freedom.

"What is a fair price for freedom?" Bartlow asked.

Mankind has asked that question since the dawn of time, he said. Many of those who came to America knew what was a fair price for freedom.

"Some came as enchained slaves. Some came in search of riches," he said. "But they all knew what a fair price was."

Bartlow said he had special words for those who died in pursuit of freedom.

"All who have died for us have known what a fair price is for freedom," he said.

There are others that should be honored, Bartlow said.

"It is not just our military that fights for freedom," he said. "It is our astronauts, our policemen, our firemen, and even our teachers."

In addition to words of praise, Bartlow said he also had words of warning.

"The world is still violent and unstable," Bartlow said. "The price for freedom will never be cheap."

Bartlow concluded the ceremony by reminding everyone that "we are free because of the lives of many."

After Bartlow's speech, retreat was sounded and the American flag was lowered.

Russia held U.S. prisoners

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Russian President Boris Yeltsin told U.S. senators Wednesday in a letter that Americans were held in prison camps after World War II.

Some were "summarily executed," he said, but others still live in his country voluntarily.

Yeltsin's letter also said some Americans had been forced to renounce their citizenship.

Russian leaders are almost certain no U.S. citizens are still being detained, Yeltsin said in his letter, read to a Senate committee by the general who serves as Russian head of a U.S.-Russian commission searching for American POWs and MIAs.

Gen. Dmitri Volkogonov told the Senate Committee on POW-MIA Affairs that he has pored over Russian archives, but he has found no evidence that any Americans captured in the Korean or Vietnam wars were taken to the former Soviet Union.

He said he was aware of only nine American servicemen who deserted in the Vietnam War.

Student senators may be a little draggy Friday morning.

Debate is expected to be heated and last long into the night as Senate discusses the Athletic Fee enhancement bill during the meeting at 7 tonight in the K-State Union Big 8 Room.

If the bill passes, it will increase athletic fees to $17 for full-time students and $8.50 for part-time students per semester. The fee now is $10 for full-time students and $3.50 for part-time students.

Anglicans to allow female priests

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LONDON — The Church of England voted Wednesday to ordain women as priests.

It's risking a schism with a stubborn minority in its pulpits and pews who feel the move contradicts Scripture and tradition.

The vote allows the Church of England to join 12 of the 28 self-governing provinces in the Anglican Communion that now ordain women priests — most of them in the 2.5-million-member Episcopal Church in the United States.

But in Rome, Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro said the vote was a grave obstacle to repairing the 16th-century split between Roman Catholics and Anglicans.

"The church has been emotionally exhausted over this. Now we can get on with preaching the Gospel," said Cave Bergquist, a chaplain at Trinity College, Cambridge, who was in the crowd awaiting news of the vote outside Church House in central London.

With a two-thirds majority required in each of the three houses of the church's General Synod, the legislation was approved 39-13 by the bishops, 176-74 by the clergy and 169-82 among the laity after a day-long debate.

A switch of just two votes among lay delegates would have blocked the path to priesthood for Better turn in your library books

KARREY BRITT
Collegian

You may not be able to pay your overdue library fines with pocket change anymore.

Manhattan Public Library overdue notices can be serious, and if not acted upon, one can be prosecuted by the city attorney under a new amended section of the Code of Ordinances.

Sept. 1, the Manhattan City Council amended Section 22-26 of the Code of Ordinances to classify as "petty theft" failure to return material borrowed from the library within 30 days after receiving notice by a certified letter.

Overdue notices will be sent on the 10th, 20th and 30th day after due date.

If the material is still not returned after 45 days, the library will send a second, final notice in the form of a certified letter.

Failure to return library materials after receiving the final notice will result in prosecution.

"The whole incentive is to get the books back," said Judith Edelstein, assistant director of library services. "Since the library will have mailed three notices during a 45-day period, there is plenty of warning and no excuse for not returning books.

"The new city ordinance offers us a means of dealing with people who deliberately refuse to return library materials. It is designed to help us in the same way that prosecution for bad checks helps small business owners."

She said they only have trouble with a few borrowers.

"We don't want to hurt the 98 percent of our borrowers, who are really responsible," she said. "However, the city attorney suggested we make a city offense for those we do have problems with."

Besides adding a prosecution

Thien recognized internationally

BILL SPIEGEL
Collegian

Steve Thien, professor of agronomy, has won the 1992 Agronomic Resident Education Award from the American Society of Agronomy.

The award recognizes excellence in resident classroom teaching. About 20 people have won in the past.

Thien said the award has given him a new sense of responsibility in teaching agronomy.

"Receiving the award gives a renewed charge to maintain the standards of teaching that have enabled me to win," he said.

He said it is rewarding because the winner is selected by other agronomy professionals.

"The most gratifying thing to come with it is the recognition by our peers," he said. "You always feel honored when selected by your peers."

Winners are selected according to classroom traits, such as classroom skills, innovative or unique approaches to encourage learning and performance of graduates, he said.

Also considered are student-teacher interactions and recognition of teaching accomplishments by the university or other professional groups, he said.

Because it is an international award, Thien said he was especially pleased because of the high number of candidates.

"Potentially, every university could nominate somebody," he said.

K-State's agronomy department put together the materials to nominate him, he said.

Gerry Posler, professor of agronomy, won the award in 1986. He said winning made him want to come home and work harder.

"Winning gives you a sense of humility and pride and improves self-confidence," Posler said.

He said he was pleased that Thien won this year.

"Steve is very knowledgeable about his subject. He is well-organized and disciplined and wants the students to learn," Posler said.

"To have two faculty in our department receive this award in six years reflects well on the faculty here at Kansas State University," he said.

Being both mom and dad a challenge

Single mothers juggle pressures of school, children

MEGAN MULLIKIN
Collegian

Being a mommy and a student is a full-time job — plus a lot of overtime.

Many single moms say the biggest problem they face is juggling their time to accommodate the pressures of school and children.

"I'd say the biggest problem I have is sorting out my time and having enough time for my kid," said Michelle Herdman, senior in accounting and management, who will be 26 on Monday.

"It's hard, because I know when I have a paper or something I have to shove my almost-2-year-old son aside and say, 'I have to do this.'"

Cheryl Wilson, a 24-year-old junior in criminal justice and social work, also said it is difficult to find free time for her 5-year-old son.

"It just seems like grades are so important, especially when I'm applying for financial aid, that I'm always saying, 'Joshua, honey, go watch TV, I have to study,'" Wilson said. "I end up putting him second to my classes."

Kay Ediger, social worker for Manhattan public schools, said universities do not have the facilities to provide for single moms.

"K-State is not set up to accommodate parents in terms of child care," Ediger said. "A professor doesn't care that you couldn't get a babysitter; they just aren't attuned to that."

Ten percent of non-traditional students on campus are single parents, said Mary Pickard, graduate assistant for the FENIX adult services.

Both Herdman and Stephanie Womack, junior in business management, said they would have waited if they had it to do over.

"I would choose to wait," Womack said. "I love my daughter very dearly, and I love watching her grow, but if I could do it all again I would graduate and get a good job first."

Herdman said she was living with the father of Nicholas, her son, when she got pregnant.

"I made my choice to leave him. Unfortunately, it was after I got pregnant that I realized things weren't working out," she said.

A few months into her pregnancy, she said, he told her he "didn't want to be a daddy." She told him to leave and not come back. She hasn't talked to him since.

"It was like I got pregnant by myself," Herdman said.

Even though it's a difficult route to getting a college degree as a parent, Herdman said having her son — who turns 2 today — forced her to strive even harder for her goals.

"It would probably be easier on both of us if I would have had my son after graduation," she said. "But having him has made me more focused. I have to get good grades so I can get a good job to provide for my son."

"Having someone you're responsible for keeps you more focused on what you need to do," Herdman said.

Wilson also said her son helped her realize her responsibilities. She said she might not have ever considered getting a college degree without the pressures of raising a child.

"Because I was living such a wild life, I don't think I would have ever gone to college," Wilson said.

Joshua has always been my support in the major decisions I've made. I probably would have continued partying and living that kind of a life."

Ediger said one advantage of raising a child alone is that at an early age the child begins to understand and see the importance of higher education.

"It is a wonderful role model when children can see their parents going to college," Ediger said. "Usually these children are very proud of their parents."

One thing Wilson said was an important factor in a single-mom family was a father figure. She said Joshua's grandfather and great-uncle were always very important in his life because they provided male role models.

"I think there is a lot of truth in the fact that kids need a father. Probably not for all kids, but I think it does cause turmoil in their lives," she said.

It's hard for children to understand why they do not have fathers, Wilson said.

"When Joshua was at day care at K-State, it was very confusing for him — why he did not have a daddy," Wilson said.

"You have to be so careful when answering these types of questions. You can't make it sound like you can just go out and buy a daddy at Wal-Mart."

Wilson said she is promised to marry Richard Martin, who now lives with her and Joshua. When Martin moved in, Wilson said, she had to make a lot of changes, especially scheduling her time.

"It was difficult to incorporate someone else in my schedule," she said.

She said it was also difficult to explain to Joshua that Martin was there to stay.

Joshua had become accustomed to Wilson occasionally going on dates, she said. But she had never dated anyone long enough for Joshua to become attached as he has to Martin.

"He's always asking 'When's my daddy coming home?' He's still afraid that Rick won't be coming home," Wilson said.

Workshop provides education on rape

JENNIFER BEALS

Straight talk on a serious issue.

The laws on rape, the legal process that follows and conflicts between men and women were the topics of a rape workshop Wednesday in Holton Hall.

The program, sponsored by the Women's Resource Center, was the third in a series of workshops that were first designed to educate faculty members about rape but were later expanded to include the campus.

Gabrielle Thompson, assistant Riley County attorney, spoke on the legal definition of rape, which is penetration of the female sex organ by the male sex organ, another part of the body or an object without the victim's consent.

Rape occurs if the victim is overcome by force or fear, is unconscious or is physically powerless, Thompson said. Other circumstances are if the victim is unable to give consent due to a mental deficiency that was obvious or known to the offender.

Rape also occurs if the victim is unable to give consent due to intoxication by alcohol, drugs or other substances given to the victim by the offender or by someone else with the offender's knowledge unless the victim consumes the substance voluntarily knowing its nature.

However, Thompson said an amendment has been added to the Kansas law, which will take effect July 1, 1993. It includes changing

Agencies offer job information

JENNIFER SHANK
Collegian

The Division of Personnel Services is conducting its annual Employment Information Day Friday.

The all-day event will be in the first- and second-floor rotundas of the Statehouse in Topeka.

Jeff Montague, personnel management specialist in the state Division of Personnel Services, said the information day is a way to learn more about civil-service employment.

"The Employment Information Day should not be confused with a job fair," Montague said. "The agencies represented are there to provide information to the public on how to seek employment for the state."

Fifteen state agencies will be represented at the event to offer information about what kind of jobs are available. The event is open to the public, Montague said.

There also will be booths showing how to apply for state jobs and prepare resumes.

"The agencies represented — for example,

America taking positive steps

THE ISSUE

The recent suspension of Detroit police officers for fatally beating a motorist has revived memories of similar past incidents.

WE SUGGEST

We need to support President-elect Bill Clinton to help eliminate racism and harassment in America.

The prompt national attention to a police beating in Detroit last week calls to mind several bittersweet victories the country has witnessed this past year.

A year ago, the nation watched Anita Hill face an all-male Senate Judiciary Committee during the Clarence Thomas confirmation hearings. Thomas was confirmed, and Hill was made to look like an opportunist.

But months later, she was getting standing ovations from people who heard her talk about gender and rights. Today, more than ever, sexual harassment complaints and lawsuits are taken seriously.

Then Rodney King was beaten to death on videotape. Americans were stunned by the Simi Valley jury's decision not to convict four of the officers for using excessive force.

Dismay turned to anger, anger to violence. South central Los Angeles erupted in riots that left the city a burning symbol of a nation's pent-up anger and dissatisfaction.

But the nation's pain and confusion over what many saw as an outrageous injustice was unifying. Little bits of healing went on in communities everywhere. Our own University community continues to try to heal divisions caused by things like race and gender.

And during an election year, the recession, making the future look futile for millions of Americans, brought people together.

Harassment, discrimination, violence, corruption and desperation.

And out of all this came some good. The fatal beating last Thursday of the Detroit motorist made national headlines the day it happened. The officers were suspended without pay, pending an investigation and possible criminal charges.

Some things still work in this country. There is still hope and justice to be had.

But stern reminders unfortunately seem to be what it takes to turn things around.

With all its faults, this year's campaign was one of the most lively, grassroots political action the country has seen recently.

Good luck, Bill Clinton. There is still a lot more healing to be done.

And to all you who became involved, don't stop now. What you've done already is amazing. Without your continued support, our new president will get nowhere.

Christmas is now for the capitalists

A few days ago, I was gently rousing myself for a bright new day when my morning mood suddenly riveted into startled anguish.

I sat up in amazed horror. Floating through the air of my dawn-lit room was the dulcet voice of Bing Crosby singing "White Christmas." Here in this surreal scene, raw anger wreaking havoc with my blood pressure, I paused as in a calm before the storm.

Then I passed out from the head rush of sitting up too fast.

When I woke up some hours later, it was the Andrews Sisters' version of "Deck the Halls" playing too loudly on the neighbors' stereo. With this episode, the annual ordeal of the Holiday Season had begun for me.

Christmas seems to come earlier every year. This year, the Santas were up before jack-o-lanterns made their Halloween appearance. If you walk into any store, you will find it full of Christmas sales and ho-ho regalia.

It is inescapable. The consumer frenzy that marks the onset of Christmas has begun.

It may just be that we are in a recession and stores are desperate to find ways to stimulate purchases. But making Christmas earlier seems to be a steady trend.

Much has been written about the consumerization of Christmas and that people have forgotten what the holiday is really about. Stores goad consumers into an orgy of purchasing. The gift-giving of Christmas tradition is exploited to create profits for the atheist capitalist.

Through this process, the economic powers commodify religion, making articles of faith available at bargain-basement prices. Religious belief becomes cheap, and the true values of Christmas are buried beneath steamy heaps of reindeer flux. It gets earlier every year.

That is a quick summary of the standard line on the Christmas season, which all of us have heard many times before. The thing is, I don't buy it. Blaming all this winter annoyance on capitalism and the economic powers just doesn't explain people like my neighbor who are genuinely caught up in the rapture of Christmas glee before the first of November.

I am left wondering if, in today's culture, real religious feeling has been replaced by a wistful, nostalgic feeling of more innocent days past. Our repertoire of Christmas songs, particularly those appearing on those annoying TV commercials, are telling in this regard. They stress the family and winter experience.

The Christmas season is not an attempt to buy religion, but an attempt to buy back the way things were.

For our culture, Santa has supplanted Jesus, but not because he represents gift-giving largess. Instead, Santa represents the myths of childhood. A quest for him is a quest for innocent youth.

The religious side of Christmas has come to represent only the seriousness of adulthood. What once signified renewal and salvation now is a reminder of division and the march toward death.

So the beginning of the "Christmas season" at the end of October is the beginning of our annual charade of nostalgia. Our culture has grown addicted to it, clutching at it like reefer roaches after a Grateful Dead concert. It gets earlier every year.

The old symbolism is steadily dying. Before long, children will no longer remember that Christmas is associated with Christ at all. The increasingly premature birth of the Christmas season may eventually result in a miscarriage, with Christmases becoming a mere memory. Or the "Holiday Season" may become something completely different.

At any rate, it will change. And if it confines itself to the period after Thanksgiving, it will be a welcome change to me.

And if the music keeps up, the halls aren't the only thing I'll be decking this joyous season.

OTHER VIEWPOINTS

In the final days of the campaign President Bush tried to reassure voters the economy wasn't as bad as his critics claim. He cited the latest 2.07 percent growth rate, plus other recent positive signs, to make the point that low inflation and low interest rates were putting the nation on a slow but steady road to recovery.

The Clinton camp dismissed the good news as, at best, an aberration; at worst, the government "cooking the books" to save the Bush presidency.

But now that the votes are counted and Bill Clinton has been elected president, his economic advisers are singing a different song. They're forecasting that the economy will rebound to a 3 percent annual growth rate next year. They cite low inflation, low interest rates and the government's latest economic data as reasons for their optimism.

That raises an interesting question: If Bush and Clinton are in essential agreement on the economy, what in blazes was the campaign all about?

The Augusta Chronicle, Augusta, Georgia

After 12 years in the White House, the Republicans are beating a divided retreat — some convinced George Bush betrayed conservative ideals. In America's eyes, Bill Clinton's first quality is that he is not Bush, who mastered world crises with panache, but remained paralyzed faced with rising dissatisfaction and suffering of his fellow citizens.

Le Soir, Brussels, Belgium

Whether we like it or not, and despite the assurances of Bill Clinton of "internationalism," we are facing an American administration that will be more protectionist and more isolationist than its predecessor.

We are still far from reflecting on implementing a new world order and a Euro-American partnership. Nothing indicates that Clinton thinks these problems are important.

ATHLETIC FEE

Fee necessary to keep campus image intact

Editor,

I am writing in support of the proposed student athletic fee enhancement.

I am not a student senator, nor am I an athlete or even a member of Sports Club Council. What I am is a student willing to support other students who represent our University every day, sometimes all day.

Right or wrong, universities are often judged or perceived by their athletic success. We should continue to support our fine academic programs, as K-State has fielded the National Championship Debate Team and continues to produce prestigious scholarship winners. But equally successful athletic programs will only enhance these academic achievements.

This enhancement is an investment, and even though it does not directly come back to my pocket, I am in favor of it because it benefits K-State.

Shannon Scherzer
Senior/Marketing

just who has the power in this situation. It isn't the Athletic Department, who's in it for fast cash. It's Student Senate, who controls the purse strings.

We already pay $340,000 each year for athletics. Since Milt dictates band budget, though, Senate could tell him to decently fund the band. As incentive, Senate should offer to "enhance" the current athletic fee and redirect it to the band.

Fred and Milt are trying to pass themselves off as saviors of the band and other projects by proposing this 70-percent fee increase. To put it in athletic terms, Senate needs to realize that they are being "hustled," should "straight-arm" the "enhancement," and take care of the band and sports clubs on an individual basis.

AND FEES AGAIN

Students need to help support athletic clubs

Editor,

This letter is in reference to the proposed student Athletic Fee increase being debated in Student Senate.

After reading the column by John Hawks and the letter to the editor by Shawn Kitchen in the Nov. 5 Collegian, I came to realize that many students do not understand how important it is that Senate pass this fee increase.

Hawks whined about having to pay an extra $7 a semester for money that would go to what he said are "worthwhile programs that are underfunded and deserve to get more money."

Unfortunately, he didn't think the money should come out of his pocket. Well, John, where do you suggest the money come from?

As a member of the K-State Marching Band and Pep Band, I feel the effects of our severe underfunding. The K-State Marching Band budget is the lowest in the Big Eight Conference, and even if our budget were tripled, it would still be the lowest. Our budget has remained virtually the same for almost 10 years and, in fact, has gone down.

Hawks stated that "deserving programs like the band's should be financed by our current Athletic Fee."

If you had done your research, you would have found out that 100 percent of the marching band's budget comes from the athletic department. We don't receive money from any other sources at this University, including our beloved Student Senate.

In conclusion, I'd like everyone to imagine what a football game, basketball game or pep rally would be like without the band. It would be deadly silent.

This could be a reality at K-State in the future if the Athletic Fee increase is not passed by Student Senate tonight. Please, the band needs your help.

Fatal beating causes fear

"I can't believe this is happening in my city. The police used to be our friends."

CARRIE WASHINGTON

Neighborhood worries about police after death in Detroit

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DETROIT — At the intersection of Warren and 23rd, where empty lots and boarded buildings still bear witness to the riots of the 1960s, there's a new focal point: the police violence of the 1990s.

On a wall adorned by flowers is a plastic-covered picture of Malice Green, a 35-year-old man beaten to death by police last week.

It has become a gathering point for neighborhood residents who come to see the spot where Green died, to see where gravel has been spread to hide the blood stains.

"I can't believe this is happening in my city," Carrie Washington, a mother of three grown children, said in frustration. "The police used to be our friends."

The death of the black motorist at the hands of a racially mixed group of police has roiled this city, noted for its integrated neighborhood policing.

The case resounds with disquieting echoes of the Rodney King case. But those familiar with Detroit's police say Malice Green's death points to something else: an undermanned force lacking the money or leadership to weed out "thumpers," the violent cops of both races.

Green, an unemployed father of five, died from head injuries in a fracas Thursday with police.

While no official details have been released, witnesses said the confrontation began as Green dropped off a friend near a boarded-up hair salon suspected to be a crack house.

Two plainclothes officers in a "power unit," an unmarked car assigned to high crime areas, confronted Green. Witnesses said police began beating him when he refused to drop something in his hand, identified variously as a wallet, a piece of paper or drugs.

Other officers arrived. Lee Hardy, an emergency medical technician flagged down by police, told the Detroit News he saw four white officers kick Green in the chest and beat his head, arms and hands with a flashlight.

Six white officers and a black supervisor were suspended. Mayor Coleman Young and Police Chief Stanley Knox, both black, decried Green's death. Young went as far as to call it murder.

Residents of Green's neighborhood huddled under umbrellas and sheltered flickering candles in their hands Tuesday night during a vigil at the death scene.

"I'm surprised they went that far," Washington said of the police. "They used to come to the house and tell us about our kids. They used to run track with them."

Others talked of mounting police harassment by black and white officers — in particular white plainclothes officers Larry Nevers and Walter Budzyn.

Nevers, 52, was a neighborhood fixture for the last two decades. Local residents called him "Starsky" after the ultra-violent TV cop.

Budzyn, 42, was named Officer of the Year by his union in 1990, for 31 arrests and recovering six stolen cars.

But the two officers had other records: 25 citizen complaints and five lawsuits.

On Saturday, Nevers told the Detroit Free Press, "I must have done something wrong. A guy died. Nobody knows what it's like out there."

Budzyn has declined to comment.

Thomas Eder, chief investigator for Detroit's Police Commission, said police brutality charges have decreased over the past decade.

The Green case comes at a time when the department has been scarred by cutbacks and scandal. City budget problems forced a 26 percent cut in the department from 5,186 five years ago to 3,850 today.

STATE

Cold weather threatens crops

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — The state's farmers are expected to reap record numbers of bushels an acre for corn, soybean and sorghum, but recent cool and rainy weather has slowed the harvest of those crops.

Kansas Agricultural Statistics has revised its estimates for the size of the three crops, increasing the projected yield for each. The November estimates came as KAS, the state's official crop monitoring agency, made its weekly assessment of crop conditions.

The agency already projected a record yield for corn in October, but its November estimate is 2 percent higher at 143 bushels an acre. The previous record yield was 136 bushels, set in 1986.

KAS expects a harvest of 243.1 million bushels of corn, making this year's crop the second largest in state history.

The record crop came in 1889, when farmers harvested more than 259 million bushels.

As of last week, 85 percent of the corn crop had been harvested, but the average figure for this time of year over the past five years is 96 percent. In northwest Kansas, only 45 percent of the crop has been harvested.

Farmers planted 1.85 million acres of corn and are harvesting 1.7 million acres.

"Most of the corn remaining to be harvested is located along the northern third of the state," KAS said.

The agency projects the sorghum crop will yield 80 bushels an acre, 4 percent more than the October estimate of 77 bushels.

The record was set in 1986, when the crop yielded 75 bushels an acre.

KAS expects farmers to harvest 248 million bushels. They planted 3.3 million acres and will harvest 3.1 million acres.

The largest crop, 311.25 acres, came in 1986, when farmers harvested 4.15 million acres.

Only 45 percent of the sorghum acreage was harvested as of last week, compared to a five-year average of 85 percent.

"The late maturity of the crop and unfavorable harvest weather have contributed to the late harvest," KAS said.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jayhawks topple Spikers

Volleyball team loses 3 straight, falls to 7-20

BRIAN ANDERSON
Collegian

LAWRENCE — Both the K-State and Kansas volleyball teams came into Allen Fieldhouse riding a one-game winning streak. At the end of the three-game match between the intrastate rivals, the Jayhawks were riding a two-game winning streak.

"We were not ready to play," said K-State coach Patti Hagemeyer, whose team fell to 0-10 in the Big Eight. "If you want to win a conference match, you have to play hard. We didn't."

Kansas won its third conference game and improved to 19-13 for the year with games scores of 15-4, 15-2 and 15-6. K-State fell to 7-20 for the season.

The Hawks jumped to a 9-2 in the first game on the heels of a block by Janet Uher and Cyndee Kanabel. Kansas had 12 team blocks, and K-State had just one.

"(Jill) Dugan and (Heather) Zoerner are our middle blockers," Hagemeyer said of the two freshmen. "They learned a lesson tonight. They lacked the finesse and some smarts even though they went against girls the same height."

The Cats got the next two points on kills by Kathy Saxton. But Kansas reeled off the next six points to take the first game.

The Hawks controlled the game after scoring the first four points. K-State got within two points on a block from Dugan and a kill by Zoerner.

The Kansas defense then shut out K-State, as the Hawks went on an 11-point run to win the second game.

Kansas rolled in the third game after taking a 6-1 lead. But a Debbie Miller kill and a Hawk error cut the lead in half.

Again, the Kansas defense stymied the K-State attack as Kansas went on an 8-3 run to take game three and its seven straight match against the Cats.

"We needed to win this match," Kansas coach Frankie Albitz said. "We looked calm and collected. They made a run in the third game, and I settled us down."

"We looked good on our blocking and serving," she said.

"Kanabel is an excellent blocker and makes us look excellent."

Kanabel had three blocks and assisted in five others. One of those assisted blocks ended the match as Julie Larkin and Kanabel got together for a block on the final point of the third game.

A player that pleased Hagemeyer, she said, was freshman Debbie Miller.

chance of an easy third game with two kills, one of which gave K-State a point and another to end a Hawk threat. Miller also had four digs in the last game.

"She is one person that wants to work hard and contribute to the team," Hagemeyer said.

"She walked on and wanted to learn more about volleyball."

Despite the lack of technique and strength, she is intense and wants to play.

"I think she deserves the opportunity to play."

Saxton led the team in kills with 14 and attacks with 33. Saxton now has 484 career kills, just 46 shy of the all-time Big Eight career record.

"She made her presence known tonight," Hagemeyer said. "We talked about what she wants to accomplish in the next two weeks. She took it in and wants to finish hard."

K-State ends its current five-match road trip with a match Nov. 18 in Lincoln against the fourth-ranked Nebraska Cornhuskers.

COLUMN

In the end, it's still Nebraska

If the verdict were to come today, Nebraska would get the last laugh. Ripped and worn, tattered and torn, the Cornhuskers find themselves chuckling at the Big Eight.

Even I am guilty. Yes, I know, I'm incriminating myself. But, sticking with the same old running game seemed to have become obsolete. Two months later, obsolete isn't the right word.

In the past two weekends, Big Red has done everything imaginable to its two closest competitors in the conference. And the Huskers did those nasty things to Colorado and Kansas on TV, too.

The CU/NU shindig was supposed to be of Titanic proportions. You know, one of those dandies which goes down to the final gun and maybe a field goal wins it.

Wrong. The Jayhawks hoped to at least look better than the Buffs did in Lincoln but couldn't accomplish that.

Whip out your calculators for a quick quiz. In the last two games: Nebraska — 103; opponents — 14. Oh my!

In the last two games, the outdated Husker rushing attack has blitzed very talented defenses nearly 6-to-1. Nebraska has amassed nearly 730 ground yards while not even allowing 140.

Why does Nebraska seem like a different football team?

Quarterback Tommy Frazier. At least that's where it starts.

Derek Brown and Calvin Jones are, without question, the best one-two running back combination in the country. But going into the season, Frazier wasn't even listed on the quarterback depth chart. Nowhere.

And now that senior Mike Grant is gathering splinters with his backside, Brown and Jones are running with renewed spirit.

Those two have a QB with their moves and a better arm, yet this whipper-snapper is only a frosh. Barely old enough to vote. He's the guy Tom Osborne wanted, too. Only the nation's top-option quarterback coming out of high school, Frazier has come from the bottom of the pile to show the football "brains" Nebraska wasn't off base to stick with the running game.

Look at Colorado and Oklahoma on the other hand — struggling offenses that are prone to turnovers. To their defense though, it'll take more than a year to develop proficient passing attacks.

Even though the Huskers are ranked in the top five, two facets of the Nebraska season still give me the willies. One is no more home games. Every time Tom Osborne takes his kids to Norman, my stomach does the twist.

Then comes the nightmare of all nightmares — the Orange Bowl — which Nebraska hasn't won since 1983. But if Miami and Alabama finish Nos. 1 and 2, you'll hear a big sigh of relief from me. That's because those two would play in the Sugar Bowl New Year's Day, and the Huskers would get somebody else.

Personally, I don't care who Nebraska plays Jan. 1.

This Big Red machine is punishing opponents as the teams of old did. Not only for their sake, but for the sake of the Big Eight conference, I hope Nebraska doesn't fold when we go Bowling in 1993.

It would be a shame for the team who's looking over its shoulder at the rest of the Big Eight.

7 Wildcats make academic team

COLLEGIAN STAFF

K-State placed seven football players on the academic all-Big Eight honor roll, including three on the first team, the conference announced Wednesday.

Nebraska headed the list with 12 selections, including six first-teamers.

Missouri was second with eight honor-roll members, followed by K-State and Kansas with seven each.

Missouri placed five players on the first team and another three on the second team.

Both Iowa State and Oklahoma had six players selected for the honor-roll team.

Colorado had five players chosen, and Oklahoma State was represented by three.

Kansas and K-State each had three players on the first team.

For the Wildcats, center Quentin Neujahr, linebacker Brooks Barta and safety Thomas Byers made the first team.

Barta joined Colorado offensive lineman Jim Hansen and Nebraska punter Mike Stigge as the only three players to be selected to the first team for the fourth consecutive year.

The three are among 19 football players nationwide recently awarded National Football Foundation post-graduate scholarships.

MAJOR LEAGUE BASEBALL

Maddux wins NL Cy Young Award

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Greg Maddux, who won 20 games for a losing Chicago Cubs team, outdueled Atlanta ace Tom Glavine Wednesday to be named winner of the National League Cy Young Award.

Maddux, now a free agent, went 20-11 with a 2.18 ERA for the Cubs. He received 20 of the 24 first-place votes from a panel of two writers from each league city.

He was named second on the remaining four ballots, finishing with 112 points.

Glavine, trying to become the NL's first repeat Cy Young winner since Sandy Koufax in 1966, was 20-8 with a 2.76 ERA. He got the remaining four first-place votes and finished second with 78 points.

Maddux won despite the Cubs going 78-84 — seven of his losses came in shutouts — and finishing fourth in the NL East.

He is the fourth Cubs pitcher to win the Cy Young, joining Ferguson Jenkins (1971), Bruce Sutter (1979) and Rick Sutcliffe (1984).

Maddux also is the first NL starting pitcher to win the award on a team with a below-.500 record since 1976.

"I was pleasantly surprised. I thought I had a good enough year to get it, and to get it means a lot," Maddux told Chicago's WLS-TV.

Maddux was the first Cubs pitcher to win 20 games since Rick Reuschel went 20-10 in 1977.

Maddux gave up four or fewer hits in 12 of his 36 starts.

"You never really know how good you can be if you put together the best year you can. I felt like I did that this year," he said. "To be rewarded for it in this way is very gratifying."

Maddux now will see exactly how much he's worth. He rejected a five-year, $28-million contract offer from the Cubs shortly after the All-Star break and filed for free agency when the World Series ended.

SPORTS DIGEST

► CHIEFS PUT LEWIS, DYAL ON INJURED LIST; SMITH CUT

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — The Kansas City Chiefs placed cornerback Albert Lewis and tight end Mike Dyal on injured reserve, and they signed veteran running back Bill Jones, the team announced Wednesday.

The Chiefs also removed rookie wide receiver Michael Smith, a former Wildcat, from the practice squad.

Lewis, 32, and Dyal, 26, both suffered broken forearms in the Chiefs' victory over San Diego.

Both had surgery Monday to repair the breaks. They will miss at least the next four games.

Jones, 26, was waived by the Chiefs Oct. 14 after playing in the team's first six games. He is mainly a blocking back.

This season he has two receptions for six yards. In 37 career games with the Chiefs, he has 10 rushes for 47 yards, 35 catches for 240 yards and six touchdowns.

► MILWAUKEE'S MALONE UNDERGOES BACK SURGERY

MILWAUKEE (AP) — Milwaukee Bucks center Moses Malone underwent surgery Wednesday at Elmbrook Hospital to remove a portion of a herniated disc in his back.

The operation, performed by Bucks orthopedic consultant Dr. David Haskell, went as expected with no complications, the team said.

Malone, 37, who was placed on the injured list Nov. 5, will remain hospitalized through Friday.

Malone will then be placed on a rehabilitation program for up to three months.

He missed much of training camp and was sidelined for all eight of Milwaukee's exhibition games.

Malone was the NBA's Player of the Year in three separate seasons, playing with the Houston Rockets and the Philadelphia 76ers.

LATIN AMERICAN LECTURE SERIES

No simple solution to deforestation

"The main point is that there is not just one next step. We need to realize the new reality of what the problem is, and we can't solve it by education or ecotourism."

DONNA LUCKEY

Central American problem requires more than education

ANN DOOCY
Collegian

There is no simple solution to the deforestation problem in Central America, said Donna Luckey, professor of architecture and associate director of Latin American Studies at the University of Kansas.

Luckey spoke on "Deforestation in Central America: What is the next step?" Wednesday in the K-State Union Little Theatre as part of the second Latin American Lecture Series.

She began by stepping into the forest experience, playing sounds from Central American tropical forests. She explained what is happening in Costa Rica.

"We need to step out of our normal perspective when it comes to approaching this wicked problem," Luckey said.

"We don't just reforest or change the economic and political structures. There are different ways of perceiving the problem," she said. "We as Americans have a powerful desire to solve problems through education."

Luckey said the issue is important because people need to realize different environmental characteristics and cultural differences.

"Only 1 percent of the population of Costa Rica is indigenous," she said. "We have to preserve the rights of the native people."

"They have almost lost their cultural traditions. They are now trying to reinforce traditions and relations with tribes and the ecosystem."

"The main point is that there is not just one next step," Luckey said. "We need to realize the new reality of what the problem is, and we can't solve it by education or ecotourism."

Marcial Riquelme, director of K-State's Latin American Studies Program, said this, the last lecture in the series, was an important one.

"The connection between social science and natural science is very vital to the environment," Riquelme said. "Elements of sustainability are directly related to the concerns of the Costa Ricans' natural habitat."

ASIAN AMERICAN AWARENESS MONTH

Speaker stresses importance of pleasing audience and self

Fung uses color-coded cards to relay message

DIANE DENISON
Collegian

When speaking, there is nothing wrong with pleasing others, but you must also please yourself.

This was the message Catherine Fung, graduate student in adult, occupational and continuing education, gave Wednesday at a forum for Asian American Awareness Month in the K-State Union.

Asian American Students for Inter-cultural Awareness sponsored the event.

Fung spoke on developing better communications among different cultural groups.

Asking the group members to form a circle so everyone was included, she pointed out that they were doing something to please her by following her directions.

"Would you have stayed for the whole time if I hadn't have pleased you also?" she said. "Speakers must please their audience if they are to keep them."

The forum focused on how to communicate in a group, such as at a meeting, without a formal agenda and speaking only when called on.

"We are all adults here. You don't need to raise your hand to speak. Just project your voice and speak," Fung said.

"Research has shown that women's voices are projected straight at their audience in a manner where people behind them may not understand what they are saying, but men's voices project around and are understood in front of them and behind," she said.

Fung passed out colored cards to represent what speakers were trying to say. The cards were meant to help understanding between cultural groups because of the diverse ways people communicate.

Orange represented something that wasn't to be broken down and thought about by others. Green was used to represent a message from the heart, and blue was vocal or interpersonal, something to possibly cause debate.

The last color was violet, which stood for uncertainty.

By using the colors when speaking, Fung said, people could better understand one another instead of relying on tone of voice.

The forum practiced using the cards in a group discussion about pleasing people of a n o t h e r culture in conversation.

"This is only the second year we have had the awareness month, but we have had a great response this year," said ASIA member Paul Bridges, sophomore in social work.

■ ASIA will present keynote speaker Evelyn Hu-De Hart, professor of history at the University of Colorado and director of the Center of Studies of Ethnicity and Race in America, at 10:30 a.m. Friday in Union Forum Hall.

Fighting resumes in Israel

Death toll worst since clash with troops in April

ASSOCIATED PRESS

JERUSALEM — Israeli troops shot and killed four Palestinians and wounded 21 in clashes in the occupied lands Wednesday, the army and Israel radio said. It was the highest one-day casualty toll since April.

One soldier was seriously wounded in a Palestinian ambush.

Near the West Bank town of Beit Omar, soldiers shot and critically wounded 17-year-old high school student, Ibrahim Mohammed Khaleil, Palestinian reporters said. He died four hours later at a hospital.

The army confirmed the death and said troops fired after Palestinian youths stoned their jeep.

In the occupied Gaza Strip, troops shot to death Jihad Nimer Moammar, 23, after Palestinians ambushed a military patrol, the army said. One soldier was seriously wounded.

Israel radio said Moammar had thrown a grenade at the patrol. Palestinian reporters said Moammar belonged to the Red Eagles, a Palestinian vigilante group linked to a radical Palestine Liberation Organization faction.

After Moammar's death, residents gathered outside his Khan Yunis home, chanting slogans and hurling stones at an army patrol, Palestinian reports said.

The soldiers opened fire, killing Mustafa Ashur, 55, and Issam Moammar, 23, a relative of Jihad Moammar, the reports said.

The army confirmed the deaths and said the demonstrators had thrown stone blocks and iron rods at the troops.

In other clashes sparked by anger over the deaths, 21 Palestinians were wounded by army gunfire, the radio said.

Poet to share foreign works

'Sky' anthology editor spotlights writings of 131

CHRISTINA CARBAJAL
Collegian

A fellow literary colleague described her as "fascinating, enthusiastic for life, and interested in just about anything in the world."

She is Naomi Shihab Nye, and she will read from her award-winning poetry collections at 4 p.m. today in K-State Union 212.

"She's interested in the natural world, relationships among people, individuals, the way races relate to each other," said Steve Heller, professor of English, who has known Shihab Nye for two years.

For example, one poem, "Defining White," has two levels of meaning, Heller said.

On the more obvious level, the poem is about picking out a certain paint shade. On a deeper level, the poem deals with race and color, which is never a clear-cut issue.

"One tends toward certain things or attitudes; it's impossible to find anyone's race or attitude that is pure," Heller said, describing the poem.

Shihab Nye's poetry deals with not only race issues, but also issues ranging from gender to children.

Heller said she has written quite a bit about children, including some criticisms of the American public school system.

"She has faith in the system, she is just critical when it goes wrong. She's an optimist—a life-affirming poet," he said.

Shihab Nye is releasing "Connected," a new picture-story book for children.

Heller said he expects her to select readings from her new book of poems.

Some old poems and probably some works from a new anthology, "This Same Sky."

She edited the anthology, which includes works by 131 poets from such countries as India, the Philippines, Mexico and Denmark.

She excluded works from U.S. poets because she cites many other anthologies that are devoted to U.S. poets.

She said she wanted more emphasis on foreign poets.

Heller said Nye's readings may allow the listener to see the world in a different way.

"She sees commonplace events, objects, and scenes described in extraordinary ways," Heller said. "You will see the ordinary in a more revealing light."

Vocalists place high in WSU competition

JENNIFER SHANK

Two K-State students were finalists at the National Association of Teachers of Singing competition Oct. 29 and 30 at Wichita State University.

Richard Webster, junior in music, placed first in the junior men's division, while Lynn LeMoine, graduate student in music, placed third in the graduate women's division.

Students from Kansas and Nebraska competed for placings in vocal auditions. Of the 13 vocalists who represented K-State, eight were semifinalists and two were finalists.

The competition involved about 200 students from high-school, undergraduate, graduate and post-graduate levels, said Jerry Langenkamp, professor of music.

"The department is very excited to have finalists, because this is the major competition of the year," he said.

Jennifer Edwards, professor of music, said it is to the students' advantage to compete.

Edwards said being a finalist speaks well of the training of the department and of the student's experience.

MUSIC

Mixture of styles suits Texas guitarist

The Chris Duarte Group to play its rhythm and blues at Snookie's tonight

MEGANNE MOORE
Collegian

The Chris Duarte Group will be something you can tell your kids about someday.

The 29-year-old Texas guitarist, Chris Duarte, is a cross between the late Stevie Ray Vaughan and Eric Johnson.

Duarte is no stranger to the rhythm and blues scene.

He began strumming the guitar at the age of 16, both as a soloist and as a member of Junior Medlow and his Bad Boys in St. Louis-area clubs.

His trio also includes drummer Jeff Hodges and bassist John Jordan, who have been with him six and three years, respectively.

If you want any of the band's material on tape, record or compact disc, keep on searching.

The trio has yet to score a record deal, but that is something they hope their tour will clear up.

"We don't have a prediction for how long the tour will last, but it will probably go until next March. Once the record companies start hearing that he's happening, then I'm sure we'll get a recording contract set up," said one of Duarte's managers at Pet Sharks management company.

Duarte's main influence is John McLaughlin. In his shows he also mixes the sounds of Jimi Hendrix, Howlin' Wolf and Muddy Waters.

In an interview with the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Duarte said he considers himself an electric guitarist, but "I don't like to pigeonhole myself into categories. I like to play the blues. I like to play a little rock. I like to play jazz."

His manager said he is a leader in the musical field. "Chris Duarte is like Stevie Ray, but he has the formal education of note-reading and he's been deeply instructed within the basic category of rhythm and blues. He's gone far beyond in his musical training," he said.

Mitch Ulrich, owner of Vital Vinyl, booked the group. The trio was recommended to Ulrich by Kansas City-area promoters.

"The Chris Duarte Group has been selling out in K.C., Lincoln, Neb., and in Lawrence. The shows are at bargain prices for $3 and $5, so it's something you can't miss," Ulrich said.

Ulrich also brought blues guitarist Joanna Conner to Snookie's Bar last week and said he hopes to see the same number of people at the Duarte show.

"Snookie's is a better room for blues, and the people are easy to work with," he said. "If last week's attendance of almost 300 was any indication, then this week's show will have a great crowd."

The Chris Duarte Group will play at 9:30 p.m. Thursday at Snookie's. Tickets are $3 for those 21 and over and $5 for under 21.

Rape laws discussed

the last item to read, "Consent of the victim shall not be presumed based solely on the victim's voluntary intoxication."

Lisa Emigh, junior in psychology, said she didn't believe the amendment was enough.

"I found it very disturbing," she said. "Even though it was amended, it still doesn't protect the woman."

Thompson also addressed the process of reporting and investigating rape.

"If a rape is reported, a detailed investigation will begin immediately," Thompson said.

"A police officer will be sent out to speak to the victim and ask questions, and then the victim will be taken to the hospital."

Thompson said if the rape has occurred within the past 24 hours, the victim is taken to an emergency room for a rape kit, which involves a physical examination and taking samples from the woman such as semen and hair.

If the rape happened more than 48 hours before it is reported, little evidence is left unless the victim has visible injuries like bruises.

"The sooner the victim reports a rape, the better," Thompson said. "The quality of the investigation really helps in the prosecution."

The process of reporting rape is tough, she said, but it also has many benefits, such as prosecuting offenders, raising community awareness and keeping records.

"If the case isn't prosecutable, usually if someone rapes once, they'll rape again," she said.

"The information could be used in prosecuting the offender in another case."

Thompson said in Riley County many rape cases do not go to trial.

"In my seven years, I've prosecuted seven to eight rape cases," she said. "But only one went to trial."

She said one reason is that the defense attorney knows if the client is guilty and can arrange a plea bargain.

Another section of the workshop was presented by Tamara Hawk, clinical social worker in private practice, who addressed the natural conflicts between men and women.

"In every species, females choose to mate," she said. "The job of the male is to convince the female."

By using examples of animals, Hawk said different species have their own ways of dealing with rape.

"In almost every species, the female, if raped, can have self-induced abortions," she said.

"When females don't have the choice, and don't challenge, they disintegrate."

Fee increase has strong opposition, support important for students to understand where the money from the $7 increase would be spent.

The K-State Marching Band would receive $64,000, he said. Sports Club Council would get $46,000, and about $90,000 is in ticket-price reductions benefiting non-traditional students and students who purchase single-game tickets.

Wingert said $38,000 of the increase will go to athletics to support non-revenue sports, drug counseling and tutoring, football, men's basketball and baseball.

However, if Graduate Sen. Joel Gruenke gets his way, students will not only see the fee enhancement defeated, but the entire Athletic Fee revoked.

Gruenke is proposing a bill eliminating all athletic fees paid by students. If the revocation bill passes, it will remove the fee-enhancement bill from tonight's agenda.

According to Gruenke's bill, the fee was created in 1989 to help the athletics department in a financial crisis.

Since the bill has not won the support of the student body in two separate referendums, and Athletic Director Milt Richards has said he could raise an amount matching student support through KSU Foundation, the bill proposes the fee be set at zero for all students.

Wingert said he does not think Gruenke's bill will pass. He said he thought it would set K-State athletics back five years and hurt the University's image.

"It is also important to remember athletics generates a lot of money in community tax dollars that go to Topeka and come back through the funding of higher education," Wingert said.

Both Gruenke and Richards were unavailable for comment.

Sharon Grieb, senior in exercise science and pre-physical therapy, said she opposes the hike. "I think they could make better use of our student fees and the money they have," she said.

She said if the athletic department could raise money through the Foundation, then the use of more student money should not be needed.

Also on tonight's agenda is the Bramlage Coliseum fee continuance and the Educational Opportunity Fund allocation for fiscal year 1994.

Library gets tough on fines amendment, on Nov. 15, the computer system will be converted to new loan periods, and increased fines will be collected on overdue material returned after Nov. 30.

Overdue fines will go up to 10 cents per day from 5 cents.

The Manhattan Public Library fines have been 5 cents a day for more than 25 years, Edelstein said.

"Overdue fines barely cover the cost of notification, staff and computer time, mailing costs and processing," she said.

"The library has actually been losing money on overdue materials."

Maximum fine limits will change from half the cost of the item to $3 for hardback books, periodicals, and audio materials; $2 for paperbacks; $1 for vertical file items and $9 for videos.

But if the item is never returned or is lost, the cost of the item plus a processing fee will be owed.

Not every borrower purposefully keeps library materials, Edelstein said.

"We live in a community where people move around," she said. "And so many people get distracted and end up taking off with our books."

Loan periods will also change. New fiction and high-demand items may be checked out for 14 days instead of seven.

Women can be priests the church's 1,350 female deacons. If Parliament and Queen Elizabeth II endorse the decision, as expected, the first female priest could be ordained in 1994.

"The ordination of women to the priesthood alters not a word in the creeds, the Scriptures, or the faith of our church," said Archbishop of Canterbury George Carey, the spiritual head of the church.

The legislation does not permit female bishops. Also, parishes may refuse to accept a woman as priest, and bishops cannot be compelled to ordain women or accept them as priests in their dioceses.

Following its historic vote, the synod approved severance pay arrangements for any full-time priest who decided to resign rather than accept women.

Some opponents threatened to leave the church. Michael Silver, who was in the crowd outside Church House, said those who did not want the change "have no choice but to rebuild the Church of England from outside."

Bishop David Hope of London said a split is a danger.

The synod's debate underlined the passion on both sides.

"Where lies the relevance of my gender when I exercise judgment, teaching, discipline, order and spiritual endeavor?" the Rev. June Osborne, deacon of Bow in east London, told the synod.

and went to the former U.S.S.R.

But he added, "hypothetically we cannot dismiss the possibility that Americans were taken from Vietnam to the Soviet Union, but we have no precise information" about any specific cases.

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., chairman of the committee, characterized the Russians' acknowledgements as revelations.

"They will be talked to and asked whether they want to come home," Kerry said, adding that the list of names and addresses

Volkogonov delivered to the committee would be made public.

In answer to a reporter's question Wednesday, Volkogonov said through a translator that 119 Americans were held in Soviet camps after World War II. But he did not say how many were executed or how many were still living in the former Soviet Union.

Committee aides did not immediately make available any of the information Volkogonov turned over to the panel.

Kerry also said it was too early to say definitively whether any Americans captured in Korea or Vietnam were later taken to the former Soviet Union.

The committee plans to issue a report in mid-December before it goes out of existence at the end of the year.

Sherry Burton, personnel management specialist for the division, helped coordinate the employment information booth along with Evelyn Maddox, director of the division's Employment Information Services.

"Our purpose is to give guidance to those people interested in a state job and to give them tips on how to go about it," Burton said.

Escorts for people with disabilities will be provided, along with a sign language interpreter, Montague said.

REVIEW

Dismissed official denies wrongdoing in Clinton probe

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — A State Department official dismissed by President Bush said Wednesday she had done nothing inappropriate and had merely tried to make sure the department acted properly in pursuing media requests for information from Bill Clinton's passport records.

Former Assistant Secretary of State Elizabeth Tamposi commented, in a statement sent to the Telegraph of Nashua, N.H., newspaper, the day after Bush decided to relieve her of her duties.

Bush acted following reports that Tamposi's bureau had conducted pre-election searches into the files of Ross Perot and Clinton.

President-elect Clinton said Wednesday he appreciated the step Bush had taken.

"I thought it was an appropriate gesture," he said.

The State Department ordered Tamposi to vacate her office by Wednesday afternoon. A few hours before that deadline, Tamposi said she was proud of her three years with the Bureau of Consular Affairs.

Concerning pre-election news media requests for information on

Clinton, Tamposi said, "I took no action that I deemed wrong or inappropriate."

She did not make the same statement regarding allegations that her bureau searched for Perot's files as well as those of Clinton's mother. However, she said that at no time did she "initiate or attempt to expedite a review of any passport files."

She said her involvement in file searches was undertaken exclusively to ensure that her bureau properly conducted the media requests "with appropriate safeguards for all passport information."

She added: "I did not approve, encourage or condone any review of passport records other than those specifically identified" in media requests under the Freedom of Information Act.

According to published reports quoting State Department officials, there had been FOIA requests for information on Perot but none pertained to passport files.

Tamposi, who has long been active in Republican politics, couldn't be reached for additional comment.

Bosnian cease-fire no go

Combat worsens in Sarajevo; some evacuations canceled

ASSOCIATED PRESS

"I don't want anything to do with any convoys anymore. I just want these people to get out of town."

RED CROSS CHIEF
PAVA BARISIC

SARAJEVO, Bosnia-Herzegovina — Fighting erupted in Bosnia's capital Wednesday night shortly before a planned cease-fire, and the Red Cross scrapped efforts to move more civilians from the besieged city before winter sets in.

The thump of exploding mortar shells and chatter of machine guns and rifles sounded south of the presidency building in central Sarajevo, and machine guns could be heard firing in the western outskirts.

The combat was the worst in the capital in days. Intense shooting lasted about a half-hour, but fighting continued into the night at the approach of a midnight deadline for a truce throughout Bosnia that was agreed to by military leaders of the republic's warring Muslim, Serb and Croat factions.

Dozens of cease-fires have failed to stop the 8-month war triggered by the decision of Muslims and Croats to break Bosnia away from Serbia-dominated Yugoslavia.

Fighters in the field often appear to defy the orders of their commanders, but U.N. officials expressed hope this truce would take hold.

Shortly before the heaviest shooting in Sarajevo, the Red Cross canceled the evacuation of some residents after one of its bus drivers was wounded in a mortar attack.

Apparently ending a two-month effort to take away thousands of women, children, elderly and wounded because of food shortages and a lack of heat and shelter, the cancellation prompted some frustrated people to threaten to flee on foot.

"Listen, commander, I'm fed up to my ears," Red Cross chief Pava Barisic told the Bosnian army's 1st Corps commander, Mustafa Hajrulahovic.

"I don't want anything to do with any convoys anymore. I just want these people to get out of town."

The Red Cross has been battling resistance to the convoys, planned to evacuate 6,000 people, from the military forces of all parties.

The driver was wounded while returning from taking Serbs to a suburban meeting point from where they were to head to Belgrade, the capital of both Serbia and what is left of Yugoslavia.

The driver, Miodrag Bosicic, was alone in the bus. He apparently did not sustain serious wounds.

There was no indication who fired the mortar shell. Barisic told Serbs waiting at the railroad station that the convoys were canceled.

Some threatened to march to Serb-held Lukavica, where buses to Belgrade waited.

But the Serbian commuters slowly filtered away, walking home with their luggage in the darkness.

U.N. officials expressed guarded optimism that the new cease-fire accord would work despite the failure of previous truces.

"This is the first time I know of in Bosnia-Herzegovina when we have had the three groups sitting together and signing a cease-fire," said Adnan Abdelrazek, spokesman for the U.N. peacekeeping force in Sarajevo.

Earlier cease-fires used letter or verbal pledge agreements.

"Since we got the military commanders to sign it, there is more hope," said Gen. Satish Nambiar, head of U.N. peacekeepers in former Yugoslavia.

Before Wednesday's fighting, Red Cross officials had resumed moving about 750 Serbs to Lukavica.

About 350 others had been evacuated Tuesday before fuel problems and frightened drivers halted the operation.

Another convoy of about 1,100 Muslim and Croat refugees reached a Croat-held suburb late Tuesday, but not before Serbs at one checkpoint temporarily blocked the Muslims because of problems in evacuating the Serbs.

Gen. Phillip Morillon, the U.N. commander in Sarajevo, said the United Nations wanted to send observers to battlefields in the north and the west to be ready to quickly try to contain any cease-fire violations.

ESSENTIALS

Looking for Mr. and Mrs. Right frustrating for readers

DEAR CASSANDRA,

The Nice Guy and Still Waiting have got it all wrong. Their problem is not a general one outside the confines of Manhattan. Rather, I would venture to say that their problem occurs within this fair city.

You want to find a nice person to spend time with? Leave, baby! This town is for plastic, pretentious, superficial people, not normal, interesting, fun-loving folk like The Nice Guy, Still Waiting and myself.

You see, Cassandra, I've lived in several other cities throughout this big, beautiful country, and I've traveled quite extensively. Everywhere I went, I had no trouble meeting and befriending people of all walks of life. In bars, coffee shops, book stores, record stores and cafés, I took every opportunity to make friends.

I met several women during my travels, and they were open, interesting and fun. They had no trouble accepting a coffee date after the bars closed because they knew instinctively that I was just a regular guy out looking for a good conversation and good company.

That is not the case in Manhattan. Because of the onslaught of idiots like Horny and Single and D.W., women here are scared. They are uptight and timid.

I walk through a bar, and women who make eye contact with me will tense up at the possibility of interaction with me.

I smile at a woman on the street, and she crinkles her nose in disgust.

I go out on a date, and the woman has to set down a series of ground rules beforehand, such as "Remember, we're only friends," rather than just relaxing and having a good time with me.

Now, Cassandra, I know that I don't just suddenly regress to a repulsive beast every time I pass within Manhattan city limits. All the behaviors I observe in this town are radically absent everywhere else.

Again, I say to all who share the sentiments of The Nice Guy, Still Waiting and Liconus — get out of Manhattan. There is nothing for normal people here, so go somewhere else to look for Mr. or Mrs. Right.

Mad Hatter, K-State senior

DEAR MAD HATTER,

I can not entirely agree with your assessment of Manhattan. While there may indeed be some greater difficulty in meeting people here than in other parts of the country, I seriously doubt it is as bad as you suggest.

I would not hastily write off the entire city because of a few bad experiences. There are some friendly people here!

By the way, I have always wondered — what, exactly, is "normal?"

DEAR CASSANDRA,

This is to Still Waiting. Thanks for your support! I am glad someone else has experienced the same frustration as myself.

The Aggieville scene is fine for going out to have a good time, but the chance of finding the mate of your dreams is close to none. Unless, of course, you both have the "meat market mentality," in which everything might just work out fine.

The question is, how would one start a singles club, and how do you make it work? Maybe one could start with just a singles dance and see what the reaction is. This might be a Union Station-sponsored event.

From personal experience, I find it hard to just go up to someone and start a conversation, let alone go up and ask someone out. The setting alone would help, by providing a comfortable situation where you could go up and talk to different people without feeling apprehensive. Knowing what the setting will be like would alone help ease everyone's tensions.

After getting students to the event, there must be some way to get everyone to interact without making people feel uncomfortable. I think there must be some way to help the timid and shy to interact.

There is a lot to think about, but really, an event like this could not only get people with something in common together, but it could result in some really good friendships.

Most of all, more input is needed before anything like this could be a possibility. Unless, of course, everyone out there has a boy/girlfriend? Thanks again.

The Nice Guy, K-State student

DEAR NICE GUY,

Don't sweat the details — just go out and do it. You will find that, most of the time, the little things take care of themselves.

Fee debate stretches on

CRAIG HACKER/Collegian

Graduate Sen. Joel Gruenke emphasizes a point in his proposal to eliminate all student fees for athletics during the Student Senate meeting Thursday night.

Student Senate works into night on proposal to increase Athletic Fee

AMY WRIGHT
Collegian

The Union Big 8 Room looked like a fire hazard last night as Student Senators, representatives from the athletic department and interested people gathered to discuss a bill to increase the athletic fee.

At the time of publication, no vote had been reached supporting or defeating the Athletic Fee enhancement bill.

If passed, the fee would increase full-time student athletic fees to $17 per semester and part-time fees to $8.50.

That would be a $7 increase for full-time students and a $5 increase for part-time students.

Graduate Sen. Joel Gruenke failed on three out of four attempts to get amendments to the bill approved.

Senate approved an amendment requiring the athletic department to match the full fee students pay versus just the $7 fee increase.

Gruenke said he is opposed to the fee increase because he thinks the athletic department is sugarcoating its push for the money by saying the increase is in the best interest of the band and non-revenue sports.

Gruenke said he does not think the athletic department has shown sufficient evidence for needing the money. If the band or other organizations need money, he said, then legislation should be submitted on their behalf alone.

An amendment introduced by Arts and Sciences Sen. Ed Skoog failed by a voice vote after extensive debate.

Skoog proposed keeping the athletic fee at $10 for full-time students and increasing the amount part-time students pay to $5.

The amendment also proposed setting a separate line-item fee for the K-State marching and pep bands.

In addition, the amendment established an ad hoc committee responsible for determining placement and financing of sports clubs.

There is some question of whether the sports clubs should be placed under the control of Student Governing Association, recreational services or the athletic department.

Education Sen. Amy Smith said money could later be added to the Athletic Fee to support the sports clubs if the ad hoc committee decided to place them under the athletic department.

A motion by Gruenke at 1:10 a.m. to table the original bill for further consideration during next week's meeting was defeated by a voice vote.

During the open period of Thursday's meeting, 12 people defended their interests in the proposed fee increase.

Band member Mark Cook, senior in history education, said, "We need money. That is the bottom line."

Volleyball player Kathy Saxton, senior in accounting, said, "I think this issue comes down to what you have invested in athletics. Right or wrong, athletics has an impact on the image of the University."

Saxton said the volleyball team does not have enough money to play all of its games.

Step show set to shake Ahearn

KRISTEEN YOUNG
Collegian

Steppers competing in the Neak Frasty Stompdown '92 will shake Ahearn Field House at 7:30 p.m. Saturday.

The title for the step show can't be found in a dictionary. "Neak Frasty" is a term the members of Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity thought up.

"It's just an eye-catcher. People walk by and see the name on a sign, and it makes them wonder what it is," said Derrick Hardin, junior in elementary education and fraternity vice president.

This is the second year the step show has been organized by the Alphas. Hardin said previous to that, there had not been one for awhile.

"There hadn't been a large step show up here for at least three years that I know of," Hardin said.

"In most fraternities and sororities, there weren't the numbers in membership to organize something like this, but now they are getting larger."

And the number of entries in the step show is growing as well.

Last year, eight teams competed with more than 500 spectators in attendance. Entries are up to at least 10 teams, with a possibility of two others for this year's competition. Invitations were sent to fraternities and sororities at each Big Eight university.

Members of fraternities and sororities have put in many hours to prepare for the event, with the incentive of $400 each given to the winner of the fraternity and sorority competitions.

Hardin said the Alphas have spent the last three weeks putting together their routine. Before that, they spent long hours practicing for an exhibition in the Union in mid-October.

"The exhibition was to show people what stepping actually is. Some people may have thought it was just dancing," Hardin said. "It was also to create awareness about the step show in general."

At the exhibition, Alphas showed different ways to stomp and step. Stepping is a tightly choreographed rhythmic display that combines chanting, stomping, clapping and music.

Jayson Strickland, fraternity president and senior in elementary education, said stepping has been performed for years in traditionally black greek fraternities and has its roots in African dance styles. It was featured in the 1988 film "School Daze," directed by Spike Lee.

The routines are developed by members of each group, with eight or nine members in each group.

"We make up the moves from scratch. We find different beats, and then we think up moves to go with them," Hardin said.

"You may see a part or step somewhere and try to implement it. But almost all of it is original to us," Hardin said.

Some groups add to their routines with special effects, such as dry ice to cover the stage with fog.

Hardin said the step show is a chance for many people to experience something new. "It gives people a little bit of insight into a culture they might not know too much about," he said.

THE PRESIDENTIAL TRANSITION

Clinton outlines his plans

Creating jobs, repealing abortion gag rule on president-elect's agenda

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. — President-elect Clinton detailed a crowded blueprint for action Thursday.

The plan included quick reversal of Bush-administration abortion policy and creation of more than a half-million jobs in his first year.

Clinton, in his first formal news conference since the election, also promised his transition and administration would have the strictest ethical guidelines in history.

Calling on congressional Republicans as well as Democrats to work with him, he said, "The clear mandate of this election from the American people was the end of politics as usual and the end of gridlock in Washington, and the end of finger-pointing and blame."

Vice President-elect Al Gore stood nearby as Clinton fielded questions at the Old Arkansas Statehouse.

The Arkansas governor called the news conference to announce 48 additions to his transition team, a mix of political and policy advisers charged with helping Clinton build the first Democratic administration in 12 years.

"They reflect my commitment to assembling the most qualified and diverse group of people available, including men and women with broad experience, some of whom served in the campaign and others who are just joining us now as we move toward governing," Clinton said.

The president-elect then answered questions on an array of topics, from his general economic and foreign policy priorities to his specific plans to provide jobs and deal with nuclear proliferation.

He also shared his feelings on the heavy security and intense media attention that came with his election.

"I'm having a wonderful time," Clinton said. "It is an enormous responsibility, but I asked for it, and it's an indulgence to feel overwhelmed by it."

NEWS DIGEST

► K.C. STAR PUBLISHER ANNOUNCES RETIREMENT

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — James Hale, publisher of the Kansas City Star since 1977, announced Thursday he would retire at the end of the year.

Hale, who oversaw the merger of the morning Kansas City Times with the afternoon Star and saw his paper win three Pulitzers, will remain as chairman of the board of the Kansas City Star Co.

A new publisher and chief executive officer is expected to be named by Dec. 1 by parent company Capital Cities/ABC Inc.

During his tenure, the company modernized its presses and moved further into the computer age.

The most recent of the three Pulitzers came last spring, for a series on mismanagement at the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

► NEW UNEMPLOYMENT CLAIMS KEEP DROPPING

WASHINGTON (AP) — The number of Americans filing new claims for jobless benefits fell to a two-year low in late October and remained under 400,000 for the sixth straight week, the government reported Thursday.

Economist Thomas Carpenter of ASB Capital Management in Washington said the report was the latest sign that "the employment situation has at last stabilized."

The Labor Department reported first-time applications for unemployment insurance fell by 5,000 to 355,000 in the week ended Oct. 31, the lowest since claims totaled 354,000 in the week of Aug. 4, 1990. Many analysts had expected claims to rise.

Not included in the report, however, were 20,869 new claims filed under a special emergency unemployment program. That total was down from 23,497 for the week ended Oct. 24 and the lowest since 20,754 applications were filed in the week of Sept. 25. The emergency program numbers, unlike the national figures, are not seasonally adjusted.

Kansas, with 743, was one of the five states registering the largest increases.

REWARD

The Manhattan Wrecker Service is offering a $250 reward for information leading to the arrest of the person or persons who stole its flatbed wrecker Nov. 5 during the K-State-Iowa State football game. The truck was taken late in the third period of the game or at the beginning of the fourth period. The person or persons who took it may have driven it to Vaughn Street, but then it was taken to 1518 College Ave., where it was abandoned. A radar detector, Maglight flashlight, an ice chest and a charcoal grill were taken. The truck also sustained some damage to the engine and its electrical components.

If you have any information about this crime, contact Mike Baysinger of K-State Police at 701 N. 17th St. or phone 532-6412. Every effort will be made to keep your identity confidential.

Second act proves strong in play

TOM LISTER
Collegian

The opening night production of "Our Country's Good" didn't hit the ground running.

The first act of Timberlake Wertenbaker's play, performed Thursday night by the KSU Theatre Group, lost me in its long exposition and rough transitions.

It seemed the play would merely lead up to a predictably trite ending, but the strong second act proved otherwise. Once the basis of the play was established, it took off.

REVIEW

Wertenbaker's play told the story of the first Western play performed in Australia. It detailed the obstacle faced by the all-convict cast.

Most actors in the production faced the challenge of playing several roles apiece. In all, 12 actors played 22 parts.

Kevin Kelly, senior in theater, was great as Robert Sideway. His character really came to life.

LaFern Watkins, junior in theater, managed to flow smoothly through three characters. She illustrated how the cast managed to put on a variety of accents.

Sideway, a pickpocket aspiring to be an actor, listens to Lt. Ralph Clark explains problems with Sideway's performance during the opening performance of "Our Country's Good" Thursday night in Nichols Theatre.

Teens learn leadership

Peer substance abuse prevention focus of workshop

MEGANNE MOORE
Collegian

Area high-school students gathered Thursday for a two-day reunion to share their successes on leading drug-free lifestyles.

The Governor's Center for Teen Leadership retreat took place at the Rock Springs 4-H Ranch near Junction City.

The program is designed to help train middle-school and high-school students in peer drug and alcohol abuse prevention.

"Our idea from the start of the workshop is not a treatment approach. We are here to help give them a structure to follow so they can develop their own plans to stay drug-free," workshop director Ron Alexander said.

"Our kids can fall either way on the issue of alcohol and drugs. We don't focus on tomorrow. We only focus on the kids who will lead today," he said.

GCTL has been funded by the Kansas Department of Transportation for the past three years and operated by DCCCA Inc. in Lawrence.

DCCCA originally stood for Douglas County City Commission on Alcohol, but now it uses only the acronym.

"Our approach through training is to demonstrate that students have the choice to lead drug-free lives and don't have to succumb to peer pressure," Alexander said.

GCTL sponsors about 13 events a year to help young people develop drug-free programs and activities for their schools and communities.

In addition to Alexander, 60 to 80 trainers from around the state help with the workshops.

The retreats focus on three topics, Alexander said. First, information to help students learn about leadership, teamwork and application of the ideas is shared.

The other two focuses are self-identification to improve self-esteem within their teams of eight to 10 students, and ways to combat the idea of "parties and fun," which Alexander said always leads to an association with alcohol.

Students are chosen by their schools to attend these workshops on the basis of their leadership skills and willingness to participate.

"We have a variety of students who come to these workshops. We have the quiet ones, outgoing ones," Alexander said. "They're not just the typical student council leaders of the high school. We give everyone a chance to take part."

Gov. Joan Finney addressed more than 200 students during lunch Thursday, applauding their efforts to lead drug-free lifestyles.

"I'm grateful that all of you are working in the schools and joining in the hands of the KDOT efforts to solve the serious problem of drug and alcohol abuse," Finney said.

She said because of these efforts, alcohol-related traffic fatalities in Kansas have decreased.

After the retreat, Alexander said, the students will hopefully return to their schools and communities with new ways of leading a drug-free lifestyle and the leadership skills to enforce it.

Once the students have received feedback in their schools and communities, they follow up the retreats with reunions to share what plans have worked and to learn from others' experiences.

In one community, the workshops have had a big effect on students and adults.

"The retreats help the students who feel ostracized about drugs and alcohol," said Steve Smith, a student from Hiawatha.

Smith said there is a combined student-community effort in his town of 3,500 to keep young people off drugs and alcohol.

"If we keep our youth involved and get our kids to realize that we can do this, then we can keep them trained and organized to be good leaders," Smith said.

Graphics professionals offer expertise

KIRSTEN NELSON
Collegian

Nationally recognized illustrators and graphic designers will offer their work and wisdom to interested students this weekend.

ImageMakers 2, a symposium on the art of illustration sponsored by the art department and the Division of Continuing Education, will be today and Saturday in the K-State Union.

Illustrators Anita Kunz and Chris Hopkins and graphic designer Don Weller will headline the event. Other featured presenters will be artist representative Judy Neis, art director David Boss, former creative director of NFL Properties, and a freelance design consultant.

Each full-day program will consist of presentations by each artist and a panel discussion, said Gary Woodward, head of the art department.

"These will be some of the most famous illustrators in the world talking about what they wish they would have known in their degree programs and their first years of being illustrators," Woodward said.

The symposium is directed toward art faculty, students in the latter half of their degrees in the areas of art, graphic design, apparel design, marketing, advertising, and architecture, as well as professionals in the early part of their careers, Woodward said.

December graduates may have their portfolios critiqued by one of the professionals.

"I'm looking forward to getting some more input on my portfolio. I thought the symposium would be a good way to see illustrators, instead of just graphic designers, and get some tips on how they got started," said Lara Montee, senior in graphic design.

Hopkins, described by Woodward as an airbrush expert, has worked for numerous motion picture studios including Disney, Paramount, Spielberg Productions, Lucas Films, Twentieth Century Fox, Warner Brothers and Universal. He has won a gold and silver medal from the Society of Illustrators.

Kunz has worked for book publishers, advertising agencies and magazines including Rolling Stone, Time Magazine, Sports Illustrated and Playboy. Her work appears regularly in American, European and Japanese illustration annuals.

Weller has taught at the Art Center College of Design, the University of California-Los Angeles, Brigham Young University and the University of Utah. He has done illustrations for Time Magazine, Capitol Records, NFL Properties, Playboy Jazz Festival and AT&T, as well as many children's books and magazine articles.

Each of the illustrator's work will be on display in the Union Art Gallery through Nov. 21.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

IN OUR OPINION

By the Collegian Editorial Board

Duty calls again for gay sailor

THE ISSUE

The Navy was recently forced to allow an admitted gay sailor to return to active duty.

WE SUGGEST

A person's ability should not be based on his or her sexual orientation. The Navy's ban should be discontinued.

Keith Meinhold is the first admitted homosexual in the armed forces.

After declaring on national television that he was gay, Meinhold was honorably discharged from the Navy in August. This was due to the military's ban on homosexuals.

He is also one of the first to return to duty.

As per a court order, Meinhold resumed his station as a Navy sonar instructor until a lawsuit concerning the Navy's ancient ban is resolved.

The Pentagon thinks that homosexuals undermine discipline and moral. This attitude has caused the dismissal of nearly 1,500 soldiers per year.

The other side believes that people's ability to defend their nation should not be determined by their sexual orientation.

Finally, a matter that has been a black spot on the history of our armed forces may finally be drawing to a close.

It seems almost ironic that a force designed to uphold the freedom of choice is so wrought with people who would suppress this idea.

Meinhold's return to duty is a positive step. President-elect Bill Clinton's vow to demolish this inane idea when put into office will be the next step.

But it will be a long road. Such a prevailing attitude will be hard to uproot. And homosexuals within the military must still hide their orientation out of fear of discharge.

The ball is in play. It is now up to the courts to decide what step this nation will take. Its decision could have far-reaching implications on the general attitude towards the gay community.

Let's hope wisdom prevails over emotion.

The time for this discrimination has passed. America must move forward, and homosexuals, despite the attitude against them, will be moving with us.

Consider this: Maybe sore throats aren't such a pain in the neck at all Fighting off allergies and various virus-oriented enemies these past few weeks, I have been hacking and wheezing enough that I had begun to forget what it felt like not to carry a box of Kleenex with me. Cursing the schizophrenic Kansas weather — which I always blame as the major factor in any major life trauma — I kept thinking, "Well, I feel so bad it can't get any worse than this."

I was wrong. Sunday, my voice began to get a little hoarse. I figured it was just a passing phase in this virus-from-hell experience. I sat around and read, listened to some old records and spent a fairly quiet, solitary evening.

Around midnight when I was trying to sing along with the Grateful Dead, I realized that my voice was definitely in deep trouble. I opened my mouth to croon along to "Sugar Magnolia," and nothing came out.

Nothing. Not a croak, whisper or whimper.

I figured it was only temporary.

So I brewed up a cup of herbal tea and hit the hay, thinking I would be verbal again by morning.

No such luck. When I awoke Monday morning, about two hours before I was supposed to teach my first class, I found I was not any better. In fact, I was even sicker. I could not talk at all.

Needless to say, this presented a bit of a problem. I could not even envision the voiceless horrors that awaited me once I tried to proceed with business as usual.

LISA EDMUNDS

The phone rang just before I left the house. Instinctively, I tried to answer it, but all I could manage was a whisper. The person on the other end of the line must have thought they had stumbled upon some perverted game. I kept whispering "Hello, hello" but was apparently not loud enough for them to hear me.

Finally, they hung up, grumbling and cussing. (It was probably my mom.)

Trying to teach my morning class was another adventure. I had planned on giving a lecture and working through a new unit. But voiceless, all I could do was whisper a few instructions and veer off the charted course, replacing my original lesson with an impromptu in-class essay.

And so it went. Everywhere I went this week, I ran into stumbling blocks in my nearly silent condition. At first it was amusing, as I am such a verbal person, but then it got to be just plain frustrating.

By the second day, I noticed some very weird group dynamics taking place. Because I was reduced to a soft whisper in my poetry workshop, the gentle poets must have been in touch with my aura that evening. They, too, found themselves whispering in response to my whispers, often not even noticing that they were simply offering a Pavlovian response to my predicament.

My students, of course, thought it was wonderfully amusing that I could not speak. They really wanted to mess with me, trying to get me to repeat things or just trying to get a laugh. By Wednesday, I was reduced to shaking my bangle bracelets at them to get their attention. Of course, they still had the option to ignore my bells and bangles and pretend they didn't get my drift.

By Thursday, I had mastered a wonderfully simple version of my own sign language, pointing and gesturing in circles that kept getting bigger and more confident by the hour.

It became, by then, a challenge, an experience or exploration of the self. Could I pull it off? After years of using words and decibel levels to express myself or get someone's attention, could I toss aside the crutch of language and still communicate?

Yes, I'll be especially glad when my voice returns. But I have learned, at a ripe old age, the power of a whisper. It's kind of exciting.

The entire experience has been so enlightening, I might not tell anyone when The Voice does return.

Now for a University with real class

DAVID FILIPPI

It's here! Spring pre-enrollment has begun, and classes are already filling up.

Yep, I've decided to take a break from blowing my usual Friday horn. Instead, I've decided to showcase a few of K-State's more valuable educational opportunities.

What am I referring to? No, I'm not talking about the classes you'd want to brag about on a resume.

I'm talking about those classes on campus that tend to make college a more humanizing experience.

As I head into my twelfth semester here in the Little Apple, I feel like I have a pretty good handle on those classes that aren't quite so stressful.

So let's just say, for the sake of argument, that you're already bogged down just thinking about the classes you have to take next semester.

And let's just say you only need one or two more classes to round out your schedule, but you're not really looking for something to eclipse that endangered species called sleep.

What do I suggest?

I'd start with Current Political Issues (POLSC 350). This is a two-hour class that keeps you up to date on what's going on in the world.

In the past, there's been no textbook. Required reading centers on specific articles from the "Christian Science Monitor."

Sure, there are some assignments and periodic tests, but if you're an avid CNN fan like me, or a Peter Jennings regular, this class will surely be an enjoyable experience.

OK, so let's say you're looking to relax a little bit, but still get credit while you do it. Music Listening Lab (MUSIC 150) just might be the class for you.

Sure, attendance is a must, but if your class schedule is going to require you to be on campus during the lunch hour on Tuesday or Thursday anyway, why not enjoy some music while you wait for your next class?

Moving to the sociology department, there just aren't enough good things I can say about Social Problems (SOCIO 360). This class reviews a number of social issues, everything from abortion to gun control.

If nothing else, this class will provide you with an arsenal of good paper ideas for other classes.

From my own experience, I say that the one thing a fun class has to have is lots of student participation. If you're looking to get away from one boring lecture after another, I suggest Oral Interpretation of Literature (THTR 263).

This class is filled with opportunities for you and the rest of your classmates to "perform." Whether it's poetry or duo interpretation, you're actually expected to have a good time and even relax in this class atmosphere.

Although there aren't too many credit hours involved, I can't say enough about swimming, basketball, softball and volleyball, either. All of these classes are offered by the kinesiology department.

Sure, maybe you have to show some progress over the course of the semester, but you're bound to do that as long as you come to class and participate.

Finally, I want to put a good word in for Fiction into Film (ENGL 220). Although the class meets early in the day, it meets only once a week.

And yes, students watch movies, write reviews and take tests. But such a class can provide a little pizzazz in what otherwise might be a ho-hum semester.

In the end, there's nothing wrong with taking a class that makes you feel good about yourself. As you plan the next five months of your life, remember to include something you'll enjoy.

COLUMNS

Columns are the opinions of only the columnist. They do not reflect the views of the Kansas State Collegian, but instead offer a differing viewpoint.

READERS WRITE

HOMOSEXUALITY

Column disregards universal morals

Editor,

Kelly Klawonn's attempt in the Nov. 11 Collegian to portray homosexuality as a human right was nothing more than an unfounded, irrational and emotional string of pseudologic, which if followed to its ultimate end would scare us all.

Unfortunately, many things that occur naturally in society, not only fail to benefit human kind, but are actually detrimental to the operation of society. Racism, sexism and crimes of all kinds are generally accepted as bad. Who sets the standards for right and wrong?

Kelly asserts homosexuality is acceptable, because it is an issue of love and affection. I could then counter that racism is nothing more or less than an alternative way of expressing these feelings we have toward individuals. If we must ultimately judge every individual according to her own moral standards, then the terms "right" and "wrong" become meaningless.

The point I am making is that whether or not we want to admit it, we are all subject to a universal and timeless moral code. The founders of our nation realized this and set down a Constitution that would hold us to this standard instead of allowing the whims of the moment dictate right and wrong to us.

Our laws were written according to what history had tested and proved to work. Society and law exist not to gratify the desires of the people, but to protect them from their own weaknesses.

To be certain, laws are meant to protect our freedoms, but freedom only applies to those actions that lie within the law. When we let cultural attitudes dictate morality for our nation, we will have begun to knock down the very foundations upon which our freedom is built. Perhaps we have already started.

Bill Weatherford
Senior/Secondary education

Columnist spouts law when he needs it

Editor,

The one principle on which I might agree with Scott Spradlin is the separation of church and state. I wonder, though, whether he genuinely espouses it or merely invokes it when convenient.

He wants the state to stay out of the church business, but is he equally willing for the church to stay out of state business?

What does he think of the referendum that was defeated last week in Oregon, which represented the desire of the religious right to impose its bias on secular institutions? What of the referendum that passed in Colorado? Opposition to nondiscrimination ordinances implies approval of discrimination in housing and employment.

The religious right, represented locally by zealots like Fred Phelps, wants to control every aspect of everyone's life, from the classroom to the bedroom, and at the national level has shown a consistent willingness to use one of the major political parties as its vehicle. Evidently, the principle of separation between church and state functions chiefly as a special protection of the churches.

Spradlin's claim that his column "is not a hate message for homosexuals" is either duplicitous or naive. It reminds me of the Christian line about hating the sin and loving the sinner, itself a piece of flagrant prevarication.

Homosexuality is not hurt by homophobic rhetoric like Spradlin's or by the homophobic policy of the churches, but homosexuals are. Every public defense of homophobia is an abetment to acts of discrimination and violence.

Like most Christians, Spradlin wants to see himself as an emissary of peace and love, but he is in fact an accomplice to gay bashers.

Gays have no control over how they are

Editor,

We would like to respond to Scott Spradlin's column in the Nov. 10 Collegian.

We are puzzled by Mr. Spradlin's assertion that church and state should remain separate on one hand, while on the other hand he apparently believes that his personal church laws should determine state policy. Is the separation of church and state only good when it coincides with his personal beliefs?

We resent being compared to "drunkards, prostitutes, and adulterers." We were born this way; they were not. The assertion that being gay is a choice is one made by heterosexuals — people who don't know what it is like to be gay. We chose to be homosexual no more than Mr. Spradlin chose to be heterosexual.

We are amused with Mr. Spradlin's lack of trust in homosexuals. Does he need to find out what a person's sexual orientation is before he will trust him or her? With approximately 10 percent of the population being gay or bisexual, we would be willing to bet that there at least some homosexuals he trusts.

Mr. Spradlin vehemently argues against two bills that he never fully describes. What do the bills actually say? The column never tells us. We seriously doubt that Senator Kennedy is "in favor of homosexuality." We feel that he is simply in favor of equal rights under the law for all persons.

The Bible is, and always has been, open to interpretation. Whose views and morals are right? Has self-importance consumed Mr. Spradlin to the point that he has deemed himself the final judge of right and wrong?

We certainly respect Mr. Spradlin's right to express his personal views. However, we object when he suggests his views should become public policy that affects our lives. We simply ask for equal treatment for all persons, regardless of race, sex, religion, ethnic heritage, or sexual orientation.

COMMENTARY

Removing the confusion surrounding evaluations

The following was composed from discussion from an informal group from the University community and is in no way officially sanctioned by K-State. The group's main purpose is to raise ethical issues and concerns of interest to the University.

What appears in this column is strictly the opinion of its author, and in no way should be interpreted as the only viewpoint to be considered. The sole purpose of the column is to elicit discussion and debate about its contents.

The members of the group are Calvin Drake, Bernd Foerster, Kay Garrett, George Ham, Robin Higham, Jackie McClaskey, Harold Prins, Beth Unger, and Maarten van Swaay.

If anyone is interested in participating or debating any issue presented, please feel free to contact any of these individuals.

One of the standard rituals of the second half of every semester is the collection of student evaluations for most courses on campus. You know the drill: The instructor is asked to stay away for 10-15 minutes, and someone distributes the evaluation form, usually the TEVAL. Then the forms are processed under conditions that protect confidentiality.

The evaluation and release policies have been designed to ensure that instructors will not be tempted to bias their grade assignments on the basis of evaluation data.

One may ask several questions about the significance of evaluations and about the policies under which they are obtained and released.

Contrary to popular understanding, the forms are neither intended to serve nor appropriate as a tool to support salary and promotion decisions. The designers of the forms have explicitly recognized that the forms are primarily intended to help instructors improve their teaching style.

It is understandable that some students may fear retaliation for adverse comments; instructors could be tempted to use their power as graders for the purpose.

But instructors are hired on the expectation that they will teach and grade only on the basis of performance, rather than on likes and dislikes. That expectation has to rely on trust and cannot be enforced by mere anonymity of evaluation data.

If there were reasons for students to fear revenge from an instructor for a negative evaluation, the opposite could also be true: Why wouldn't students, under the cloak of anonymity, be tempted to take revenge on an instructor? If instructors must sign their name on each grade list, and if anonymity is enforced for student evaluations, one might be led to conclude that instructors are perceived as less trustworthy than students.

On a practical level, it should come as no surprise that for any type of evaluation, a comment carries far more weight with a signature than without it.

There are two reasons for this: The signature implies that the writer stands behind what is written, and the writer is willing to elaborate on demand. Usually, this willingness also indicates that the signed comment is a carefully considered opinion, rather than a casual remark tossed out.

The K-State evaluation policy does not say that students must not sign their name, only that students must not be required to attach their name.

It is entirely proper that students have the opportunity to submit anonymous comments, just as it is entirely proper that instructors sign their grade list. After all, they are required to evaluate students and are paid for that task, whereas students are only asked to give their opinion. But students should and do have the freedom to make their own decision whether or not they want to attach their name.

It will come as no surprise that written comments can have a much larger effect than checkmarks in boxes. A checkmark is easy to place. It does not require much expression of thought, and it leaves most students with the idea that one more checkmark is unlikely to make much difference.

In contrast, a written comment requires deliberation and careful selection of words.

In a Collegian article about two years ago, a guest columnist wrote about student evaluations and complained that nobody ever paid any attention to their results. To support the view, the columnist described an "experiment" in which an entire class conspired to write evaluations saying the instructor should be removed from campus.

Fortunately, the "experiment" was judged on its merits, and the instructor was presumably judged on other, more reliable means.

The policy that evaluation results cannot be released to instructors until after the end of the semester is a bit ironic. Clearly by the end of the semester it will be too late to make improvements in a course or to let students know that they are being heard.

If evaluations are intended to improve teaching style it would be far more useful if their results became available early in the semester. The argument that late release reduces the opportunity for revenge is weak on two counts.

If the risk of revenge were at all significant, our University would be in deep trouble. Furthermore, it is no secret the instructors can easily change grades even after the grade lists have been sent to the administration. Without that authority it would be impossible to handle situations in which a student was unable to complete all the work on time for some reason.

What do you think? Would you sign your evaluation form or remain anonymous?

Would you wait until the end of the semester to write your comments or make them known early, when there is still time to change the format or style of the course?

Would you send your comments to a department head, or to the instructor who can make changes when necessary?

Would you make your comments as checkmarks, or write them out?

When you make a comment, would you make it as an experiment to see how much effect it would have, or as a recommendation, because you believe that some change would be appropriate?

NOVEMBER 13, 1992

WEEKEND CONFERENCE PREVIEW
BIG 8
CONFERENCE

► COLORADO at KANSAS

FAST FACTS: 2:30 p.m., Memorial Stadium, Lawrence, Kan., live on ABC.

RECORDS: Colorado (7-1-1, 3-1-1) and Kansas (7-2, 4-1).

THE LINE: Colorado by 3.

ABOUT THE BUFFALOES: The No. 13 Buffaloes limited the Oklahoma State Cowboys to zero or minus yardage on 30 of 58 plays in last week's 28-0 victory. It was the third time this year that Colorado has held an opponent to no yards on at least half of their plays. That Buffalo defense is leading the Big Eight, and seventh in the nation, in total yards given up. Opponents average less than 275 yards a game against Colorado. Colorado is also second in the nation against the pass. And the Buffs have offense, too. Colorado continues to lead the Big Eight in passing, averaging just less than 300 yards every contest.

ABOUT THE JAYHAWKS: Last week's 49-7 drubbing at the hands of the Nebraska Cornhuskers showed the No. 20 Jayhawks precisely where they won't be in January — the Orange Bowl. But Kansas still has the Big Eight's second-ranked offense, averaging 411 yards a game. But fullback Monte Cozzens, the team's No. 2 rusher, is still out. The defense was hammered a week ago by the Nebraska running game, giving up 351 yards on the ground.

THE SKINNY: This game has the potential to be what the Nebraska-Kansas game was supposed to be — close. The Jayhawks are coming home where the KU faithful will be a big factor. The Hawks could surprise the Buffs in this game. But the overrated, unproven Hawks will, for the second time in as many weeks, fail.

► NEBRASKA at IOWA STATE

FAST FACTS: 1 p.m., Cyclone Stadium, Ames, Iowa.

RECORDS: Nebraska (7-1, 4-0) and Iowa State (3-6, 1-4).

THE LINE: Nebraska by 28.

ABOUT THE HUSKERS: The No. 7 Huskers are quietly silencing all talk that the Big Eight is threatening to dethrone the Big Red machine. Nebraska beat Colorado and Kansas in back-to-back weeks by a combined score of 101-14. Last week, Nebraska faced the then-No. 1 rushing defense in the Big Eight — Kansas. The Huskers responded by gaining 351 yards. Nebraska backs Derek Brown and Calvin Jones are the Nos. 1 and 2 rushers in the conference, averaging 108 and 107 yards a game, respectively. Nebraska doesn't have a turnover in its last 18 quarters, a span of 357 plays. And, freshman quarterback Tommie Frazier is showing flashes of brilliance.

ABOUT THE CYCLONES: Iowa State's lone conference win was against the 1-8 Missouri Tigers. The Cyclones have yet to put four quarters together, as was evidenced in their lackluster loss a week ago to K-State.

THE SKINNY: The line has Nebraska up by four touchdowns. Is that all?

► OKLAHOMA at OKLAHOMA ST.

FAST FACTS: 2 p.m., Lewis Field, Stillwater, Okla.

RECORDS: Oklahoma (5-3-1, 3-1-1) and Oklahoma State (4-5, 2-3).

THE LINE: Oklahoma by 14 1/2.

ABOUT THE SOONERS: With starting quarterback Cale Gundy out with an injury last week, the Sooners reverted to their offense of the past — the option. Oklahoma responded with three 100-yard rushers, including Gundy's replacement Steve Collins. Collins is 12-2 as a starter for Oklahoma. The Sooners are second in the Big Eight in scoring defense, giving up just 16.4 points a game.

ABOUT THE COWBOYS: Oklahoma State has the 102nd-ranked offense in the nation. That trend continued last week when the Cowboys were held to just 118 total yards by Colorado. Cowboy head coach Pat Jones is 0-8 in his career against Oklahoma.

THE SKINNY: Oklahoma State is giving up more than 175 yards a game on the ground. The Gundy-less Sooners will thrive on the run. The Cowboys could give Oklahoma a good game, but it won't be enough.

Francis O'Neill, junior cross country runner, runs toward the finish line during the Big Eight Cross Country Championships two weeks ago in Boulder, Colo.

O'Neill provides leadership for cross country men

FRANK KLEEMANN
Collegian

In the opinion of cross country coach John Capriotti, a future first-class international runner is developing in the K-State program.

Junior Francis O'Neill, a transfer from Long Beach City College in California, is the top runner in this year's cross country squad.

"This guy has great potential. I mean, an unlimited potential," Capriotti said. "He can run anywhere from half a mile to 10,000 meters."

Actually, it's potential for a champ.

"It's going to take a while, and he has to be patient, but I tell you, there is no doubt in my mind in four or five years he can be a world-class runner," Capriotti said.

O'Neill already has proven he has talent by qualifying for the Olympic trials this summer in the 3,000-meter steeplechase.

He didn't advance to the second round, but as one of the few sophomores at the track and field trials, he showed what people can expect from him in the future.

O'Neill said he didn't practice consistently in California. Living in a beach city meant a lot of distraction — he sometimes chose to sunbathe instead of run.

Now, in Manhattan, there are fewer such temptations.

"The atmosphere for practice is different," he said. "Here there are other good runners to practice with."

Consistent training in a strong team led O'Neill to be the No. 1 runner at K-State, even though he will have competed in only three races before Saturday's District V meet in Ames, Iowa.

"It is a little bit surprising for me to be No. 1," O'Neill said. "I'm used to being in that position, but first it was surprising."

O'Neill started his K-State career with a team-best ninth place at the Oklahoma State Jamboree.

In only his second race, O'Neill captured his first individual title at the Cal-Poly Invitational, and he had the lead for a while at the Big Eight championships in Boulder, Colo., two weeks ago.

"It's the first year in Division I, and he has a great year," Capriotti said. "He has really trained seriously in the last four or five months. I think he can be an all-American this year."

Capriotti first spotted O'Neill during the runner's high-school days. He was the 1989 California high-school mile champion and continued to run successfully at Long Beach, placing sixth in his first year and fourth in 1992 at the Junior College National Championships.

"I always wanted him, because he is a great person and fun to coach," Capriotti said.

But O'Neill first chose Arkansas, the No. 1 team in the nation.

"I was ready to sign with Arkansas," he said.

Cats looking to continue strong season

FRANK KLEEMANN
Collegian

After placing first and second in the Big Eight championships two weeks ago, K-State's women's and men's cross country teams are looking forward to the national meet Nov. 23.

But in order to qualify for the NCAA championships, the Cats have to finish among the top two at the District V meet Saturday in Ames, Iowa.

The women's squad is one of the favorites in the meet represented by schools of the Big Eight Conference, the Missouri Valley Conference and other Midwestern states.

The biggest threat for the Cats will come from Southern Illinois, head coach John Capriotti said.

"I think it will be a close race, because we are basically dead even," he said. "They have a similar team to us — no outstanding front runner, but they run very close together. So, it's a toss up."

Nebraska and Kansas will also be top candidates to qualify for the nationals.

"Nebraska and KU both have two strong up-front runners," Capriotti said. "The District field will be a little bit larger than at the Big Eight. That favors the teams with up-front runners."

However, Capriotti said he has faith in his own runners, who will start their 5,000-meter race at 10:30 a.m. on the Veenker Memorial Golf Course.

"If we go there and do the things we are capable of, we should be in the top two," he said. "With Paulette (Staats), Martha (Pinto), Jeanene (Rugan), Jennifer (Hillier) and Cari (Warden) — if they run as a group — we'll be fine."

They ran as a package at the league meet, finishing between sixth and 13th place, to give the women the title.

The men's team will also run in Ames with a first- or second-place goal. Last year, the men missed a spot at the national meet by one place, finishing third.

This year, K-State has a deeper team that can challenge for the title in the 10,000-meter run.

"I think we have a shot to win," Capriotti said. "But I think it's wide open. Iowa State is much better (than at the Big Eight race) because it's their home course."

"There are five or six good teams. It could be very close. But again, if we just go there and run like at the Big Eight, we're able to make it."

The men, as the women, will run as a group as long as possible — with one exception.

Junior Francis O'Neill is expected to run in the lead. He held the lead in the conference race for a long period of time before finishing fourth.

O'Neill said he is not shooting for the individual title, but he is confident the Cats can capture one of the two tickets to the nationals.

"I think we will qualify," he said. "We have a really tight team. It's really competitive."

After the successful conference championships in Boulder, Colo., the harriers had a hard practice week, followed by a mild work-out week, Capriotti said, to keep up the Cats' good form.

"There's pressure in the meet, because if you run bad, the season is over," he said. "But if we run exactly like at the Big Eight, both teams will go to the nationals. And the girls have a chance to win the District."

Cats to face struggling Tigers

"Missouri is dangerous. They just haven't gotten it all together on both sides of the ball at the same time."

BILL SNYDER

Missouri has not beaten Division I-A team, is still favored

STEVE ROCK
Collegian

It isn't odd that the Wildcats are the underdogs in a Big Eight road game. What may seem a little strange, however, is that they are the underdogs to a 1-8 team, a team that has yet to win a Division I-A game.

K-State gets back on the road this weekend to take on the Missouri Tigers at 1 p.m. Saturday at Faurot Field in Columbia, Mo.

The Cats, 4-4 and 1-3 in Big Eight play, will take on the Tigers, whose lone win this season has come against Division I-AA Marshall.

But Wildcat coach Bill Snyder said he isn't surprised the Tigers are favored by four points.

"I think whoever makes those decisions probably understands that Missouri has the capacity to be a very dangerous football team," he said. "The odds are probably in their favor."

"I'm not talking about point spreads, but I'm talking about the capacity that Missouri has. So, I can understand why Missouri might be the favored team."

The Tigers, 0-5 in Big Eight play, suffered its worst loss of the season a week ago when they fell to Oklahoma, 51-17. In previous games, Missouri has lost close games to Nebraska (34-24), Texas A&M (26-13) and Colorado (6-0).

"They have proven that they can play extremely well against awfully good football teams," Snyder said. "Obviously, if you play Colorado to a 6-0 ball game, you've got something going for you."

K-State lost 54-7 to that same Colorado team.

"Missouri is dangerous," Snyder said. "They just haven't gotten it all together on both sides of the ball at the same time."

The Wildcats are coming off of a nationally televised conference win, their first of the season. Last Thursday's 22-13 victory against Iowa State snapped the Cats' four-game losing streak.

Missouri and K-State, last year's Nos. 1 and 2 passing teams in the Big Eight, are headed in different directions through the air this season.

The Tigers, led by sophomore quarterback Jeff Handy, are the second-ranked passing team in the conference.

Handy leads the Big Eight with 1,880 passing yards, and his 59-percent completion percentage is also tops in the conference.

Handy's favorite receiver, senior Victor Bailey, leads the Big Eight with 58 catches for 940 yards and four touchdowns.

As for the Wildcat passing game, quarterback Jason Smargiasso has thrown just 20 passes in the last two games. He has completed 10 passes for 104 yards.

"It's been hard," he said. "We're a big-play offense, and we're still having problems throwing the ball."

"But I definitely want the ball in my hands. That's when I feel most comfortable."

The Cats, whose offense ranks 105th out of 107 Division I-A teams, have depended on the run the last two weeks. In the victory against the Cyclones, running back Eric Gallon ran for a season-high 164 yards on 24 carries.

Gallon will be up against the Big Eight's worst rushing defense. The Tigers are giving up more than 233 yards, and 4.8 yards a carry, every game.

"You can't say that just because they're giving up yards you're going to get yards," Gallon said. "They can hurt you."

In last year's contest, the Tigers hurt only themselves, committing a school-record 11 fumbles and falling to the Cats 32-0 in Manhattan during a cold, driving rain.

This year, though, things could be different.

"They have the ability to score from anywhere, and they can score a ton," Snyder said.

"I think they're dangerous as soon as they get it all together."

"It's one of those things where you have to say it's about as good a 1-8 football team that you could find."

NATIONAL FOOTBALL LEAGUE

Chiefs, Krieg need some answers

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — It isn't that slumping quarterback Dave Krieg is making wrong decisions, Kansas City Chiefs coach Marty Schottenheimer said. He's just not making the right decisions at the right times.

"It's a combination of things," Schottenheimer said Tuesday of a month-long slump that has gripped the Kansas City offense.

The Chiefs, 5-4, stayed one game behind Denver in the AFC West Sunday with what many disappointed fans termed a lackluster 16-14 victory over San Diego. They spent the day squandering good field position and lost a 13-0 lead before pulling it out on Nick Lowery's last-minute field goal.

Krieg, a Plan B pickup from Seattle, has done nothing to erase his reputation for erratic, inconsistent play.

He was very effective in the first four games, as evidenced by the Chiefs' 3-1 start. But since a 274-yard passing day against Philadelphia, the 14-year veteran has slumped badly. He finally found his passing touch in the final minutes Sunday, hitting three straight passes to move the Chiefs from their own 33 to the Chargers' 18 to set up Lowery's game-winner.

As the offense has slowed, an old complaint from Schottenheimer's days as head coach in Cleveland from 1984-89 has arisen — that his offense is too predictable.

"I've heard that since 1985," he said with a grin. "If the execution is not there, then yes, you are predictable. If the execution is not there, it doesn't matter what you do."

Just a split-second of indecision can throw off the entire play, he said.

"To me, there's some indecision at times. It's not a matter of the wrong decision, it's the timing of the decision," Schottenheimer said. "You don't have a lot of time to make those decisions. A more accurate expression of it would be that they are made not quickly enough, as opposed to the right decision.

"Obviously, it has to be the right one. But it has to be timely, too. That's why I say with such certainty that it's going to get solved."

With the defending champion Washington Redskins visiting Sunday at Arrowhead Stadium, followed by three straight road games, the Chiefs had better start pondering their unresponsive offense.

"I started looking at it about a quarter to five yesterday morning," Schottenheimer said. "I've looked at it in detail, and I think (Krieg) will find himself. We'll solve it. He's as frustrated about it as anybody. But I told you before, we will solve it."

O'Neill running with world-class potential

"All last year they told me I would get a scholarship."

"But one day they called up and said they don't have a scholarship anymore."

After that, coaches and runners in Long Beach told O'Neill about K-State and its program.

"The key for coming to K-State was the coaches here," O'Neill said.

With fewer races than his competitors in his legs, O'Neill is shooting for the big goal of a runner.

"At least what I want to become is an all-American," he said.

"Mentally, I am really ready to run fast. If I run my best and don't get all-American, I'm still satisfied."

For Capriotti, there is no doubt about that. He is even looking ahead.

"He isn't as experienced yet, but if you give him time, he can be as good as any distance runner K-State ever had," Capriotti said. "And there were a lot of great people here."

SPORTS DIGEST

► FINNEY DOESN'T LIKE 'CHIEFS'

KANSAS CITY (AP) — Gov. Joan Finney said Thursday she hopes the Kansas City Chiefs football team changes its name to help restore dignity to American Indians.

Finney made her comments to a reporter Thursday afternoon after a brief speech to the National Coalition on Racism in Sports and the Media, a mostly American Indian group that has protested the use of names like Chiefs, Redskins and Braves for sports franchises.

Finney called the issue of the Chiefs' name a matter for private business to resolve. But she said her own opinion is the name should be changed.

"I'm not going to tell them what to do," she said. "I would hope they will (change the name), and I think they will."

"These are good people," she said, referring to the Chiefs' management and the Indians. "Out of the goodness of their hearts, they are going to do what's right."

Chiefs officials were not available for comment Thursday afternoon. They have said in the past that they don't plan to change the name of the franchise.

► HOWE REINSTATED TO MAJORS

NEW YORK (AP) — Steve Howe, the first player banned from baseball for life because of drugs, was reinstated Thursday by arbitrator George Nicolau.

Howe, 34, was suspended June 8 by then-commissioner Fay Vincent following the left-hander's seventh incident related to drugs or alcohol.

Howe was with the New York Yankees at the time of the suspension, which followed a guilty plea in U.S. District Court in Missoula, Mont., to a misdemeanor charge of attempting to buy a gram of cocaine.

Howe was 3-0 with six saves and a 2.45 ERA for the Yankees last season. He became a free agent Sunday, but his agent said Howe would prefer to re-sign with New York.

Nicolau, baseball's permanent arbitrator, heard the case following a grievance filed by the union on behalf of Howe. Nicolau provided the parties with a draft of his opinion, but it will not be made public until it is finalized.

► MARINOVICH GETS SHELLED

EL SEGUNDO, Calif. (AP) — Los Angeles Raiders coach Art Shell made it official Wednesday — Jay Schroeder will replace Todd Marinovich as the starting quarterback, a reversal of what happened earlier this season.

"As everybody knows, we're changing quarterbacks, going back to Jay," Shell said.

"Todd is disappointed, but Todd is also young, and he'll learn from this."

The Raiders (3-6), who've lost to Dallas 28-13 and Philadelphia 31-10 in their last two games, will face the Seahawks (1-8) on Sunday in Los Angeles.

Marinovich completed just eight of 23 passes for 117 yards against Dallas and was 3 of 10 for 25 yards with three interceptions before being replaced by Schroeder in the second quarter at Philadelphia last weekend.

Libertarians form group on campus

State party plans to discuss student groups

JILL SCHRAAG
Collegian

Campus Democrat and Republican organizations in Kansas could have some competition soon.

The state Libertarian Party will have an executive meeting at 1 p.m. Sunday in Union 206 to organize new student organizations on state campuses.

Attendees will also discuss the successes and failures of this year's elections. The meeting is open to the public.

The K-State Young Libertarians received official club status Nov. 4. Party activist Bill Earnest said he isn't surprised by the increase in college-aged Libertarians.

"I don't know why all young people wouldn't be attracted to a philosophy that means more individual freedom and responsibility," he said.

"As long as we're responsible for our own behavior and lives, and as long as we respect other people's rights, the government has no right to bother us."

Earnest, a Wichita resident, most recently served as campaign manager in Libertarian Mark Kirk's failed bid for the U.S. Senate seat held by Republican Bob Dole.

He said several students from University of Kansas and Wichita State University ran for House of Representatives seats on the Libertarian ticket in Kansas this year.

"We hope to get this kind of activity going on other campuses, too," he said.

William McKeen, president of the K-State Young Libertarians, said he believes the Libertarian Party provides an option to politics as usual.

"I was a Republican, but I got fed up with how they are," McKeen said.

"A lot of people don't know about Libertarian ideas. It's basically about freedom ... letting people do what they want to do. We believe in the philosophy of Thomas Jefferson, freedom of the individual."

Earnest said the Libertarian Party is the largest third party in the nation, and it is also the nation's fastest growing political party.

The party nominated candidates for offices at all levels this year.

"We had candidates for everything from county commissioner to the president of the United States," Earnest said.

Libertarians won some state legislature seats in New Hampshire and some minor offices in Texas and California, he said.

"We did extremely poorly at the presidential level because of Perot's activity. But we did exceptionally well at the national state level. We got more votes than we ever have in the past," Earnest said.

"I'm sure they'll elect a president at some point," McKeen said. "This year's presidential candidate, André Marrou, said there's probably 8 million Libertarians."

The Libertarian Party has annual conventions to change the bylaws, refine party structure and rewrite its platform, Earnest said.

"We keep intellectually active and alive in that manner, compared to the Democrats who haven't had a new idea in 75 years," he said.

Poet shares life experiences in verse

Poet Naomi Shihab Nye reads selections from the anthology she edited, "This Same Sky," as well as original work Thursday afternoon in the K-State Union.

Readings help students see the world differently, Nye says

RICHARD ANDRADE
Collegian

The way Naomi Shihab Nye figures it, she was most likely conceived in Topeka.

"I owe my life to Kansas," the poet joked before reading her own and others' material Thursday afternoon in the K-State Union.

Before she read, Nye explained how her father, coming from his native Palestine to study at Washburn University in 1951, met her mother, a New York City artist spending the summer in Topeka.

Whatever the location of her creation, Nye now has interesting stories of her own to tell, and to Steve Heller, professor of English, she has become well-known for her gift of "taking serious subjects and making them life-affirming."

In his introduction, Heller described a writing workshop both attended several years ago. There, he said, Nye was "the writer that everyone talked about long after the conference was over."

In her readings, the poet offered solid evidence that what he said was true.

Nye began her readings with six selections from the Graduates experience Japan

Adventuresome career seekers can join foreign teaching program

JANET SATTERLEE

Recent K-State graduates can live and teach in Japan through the Japan Exchange and Teaching Program.

"For anyone interested in Japan, the JET program provides a great opportunity," said William Richter, interim assistant provost of international programs.

Individuals are placed as coordinators for international relations (CIRs) or as assistant language teachers (ALTs), said Jim Akin, director of the Career Planning and Placement Center.

In order to be a CIR or an ALT, the individual must know Japanese, Richter said.

Assistant language teachers work with Japanese teachers by teaching or designing classes, he said.

"In some cases they team-teach or have a more subsidiary role," Richter said.

Everybody is eligible for the JET program who has completed a bachelor's degree by July 20, 1993, and is under 35, Akin said.

Those under 35 are preferred because the program is meant to foster ties between Japanese youth and young graduates in the JET program, he said.

In addition, participants must be healthy, able to adapt to new living and service conditions, and interested in Japan.

JET program participants can participate for one to three years, Akin said.

"Something reassuring that I found about the program is a high percentage of people have opted to stay multiple years," Akin said.

He said 956 ALTs, or 50 percent of all ALTs, from the United States are returning for a second or third term of teaching.

Richter said participants receive a tax-free stipend of $28,000.

According to the JET program brochure, housing is arranged by the host university, but participants pay their own rent. They also receive airline tickets from U.S. airports to the New Tokyo International Airport.

Akin said those interested in the JET program may pick up a brochure at the Career Planning and Placement Center in Holtz Hall. A video about the program is also available.

"If you are interested in the JET program, watch the video, look at the brochure, and then call Amy West," Akin said. "Amy will be very helpful to our candidates."

West, the contact person for Consulate General of Japan in Kansas City, said participants get to share their culture with the Japanese people and better understand Japanese culture.

One of the goals of the program is increase Japanese awareness of international thoughts and situations, she said.

"The program allows you to look at the heart of education and the heart of culture itself," West said.

Todd Feedback, a 1992 K-State graduate, is an ALT in the program. West said Feedback recently sent her a postcard about his experiences as a teacher at two junior high schools and one high school.

"The opportunity to live in a foreign country is very unique and can be a life-changing experience," West said.

She said the program also broadens horizons and opens minds to the Japanese culture.

The application deadline for the JET program is Dec. 15. Applications should be submitted to the Japan embassy.

GOP looks to women

Kansas lawmakers mentioned as contenders for president by next century

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LAS VEGAS — A woman, possibly Kansas Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, Kansas Rep. Jan Meyers or Elizabeth Dole, will be a top contender for the Republican presidential nomination by the year 2000 or 2004, a party official said she believes.

"We haven't seen the last 'Year of the Woman,'" said Huda Jones, president of the 130,000-member National Federation of Republican Women. "It will be the year of the woman in 1994, 1996, 1998 and 2000, until it's no longer a novelty."

"Never before have women's issues, women voters and women candidates been given so much publicity and support," Jones said Wednesday.

Jones said several GOP women could be presidential material by the turn of the century, including Kassebaum; Meyers; Dole, the former transportation secretary and current head of the Red Cross; and Reps. Constance Morella and Helen Bentley, both of Maryland.

Despite President Bush's failed bid for re-election last week, it's time to move forward, Jones said.

"Tuesday is behind us. There is no need to place blame," she said. Jones was in Las Vegas to help plan for a meeting of the national organization next September, which is likely to showcase some of the top GOP presidential prospects for 1996, including Sen. Phil Gramm of Texas and Housing and Urban Development Secretary Jack Kemp.

This was the "year of the outsider," Jones said. Republican women showed a 30-percent increase in the House of Representatives, where there are now 12 GOP women and 35 Democratic women.

"Democrats fared much better in the congressional races than Republicans," she said, crediting better financing and more candidates.

Twice as many Democratic women ran for office than did Republicans, she said.

Smatterings

BY RICHARD ANDRADE

Oh, sordid 'Sesame Street'

Scurrilous rumors are ricocheting up and down Sesame Street, and they aren't about whether Gordon is really bald.

They're about Ernie, for crying out loud. First, the poor sponge creature faced accusations of promoting homosexuality because of his almost-too-intimate relationship with cylindrical-headed, paper-clip aficionado Bert.

Now, it seems that a persistent anti-Children's Television Workshop vigilante group is gunning for Ernie again, this time starting rumors that he's about to be deep-sixed from the popular show.

The reasoning here is that since the unexpected death of Jim Henson a few years ago, no one has been able to supply an accurate Ernie voice.

"I've heard this rumor from across the country, and if you know who started it, I'd certainly like to know," said a CTW spokeswoman told Sassy magazine.

Don't worry, ma'am — we'll keep our eyes peeled.

Your chance to write the 'Great American Nightmare'

Like an overripe beefsteak tomato rimmed with cottage cheese, the corpulent remains of Santa Claus lay dead on the hotel floor.

Thus reads one of the many winning entries of last year's Bulwer-Lytton Fiction Contest, the aim of which is to see who is tops at creating the "worst possible opening sentence to a novel."

The deadline for the 1993 contest is a deceptively far-off April 15, but realize that it takes a long time to write truly awful prose. Perhaps it's time to take that yellowing manuscript out of the shoebox (or perhaps that crisp copy out of the typewriter) and send off for instant notoriety.

For rules, send queries to the Bulwer-Lytton Fiction Contest, Department of English, San Jose State University, San Jose, Calif. 95129.

Here's one for inspiration: "The mist clung to the mountain the same way a 13-year-old girl clings to her boyfriend, although the mountain wasn't thinking about 'getting lucky.'"

Yes, ladies and gentlemen, he truly is the 'Macho Man'

As if we needed more proof that the sport of boxing does irreparable damage to its participants, we have this.

In the lobby of a Miami hotel Nov. 5, former WBC super featherweight and lightweight champion Hector "Macho" Camacho, was arrested on charges of fighting with two police officers.

The incident took place after the officers attempted to quiet the boxer, who was running around yelling "I'm the Macho Man!"

Not surprisingly, the fighter seemed intoxicated and was carrying a small bag of what appeared to be marijuana.

And when everyone thought the fun was over, he continued his wacky hijinks by kicking an officer while being booked into jail.

Happy Birthday Ed, and may your mead never go rancid

If you're responsible for starting a war that lasts for 100 years, people should at least remember your birthday.

Edward III was born Nov. 13, in the year 1312. Reigning for 50 years, he later became recognized by scholars as one of the greatest medieval English kings.

Not that he didn't have his troubles, mind you. Take the year 1337, for example, when Phillip VI of France confiscated the territory of Gascony, prompting Ed to start the Hundred Years War. Now, Ed did this to defend English possessions in France and to support his hereditary claim to the French throne.

Happy moments in Edward III's life included his marriage to Philippa of Hainault, and the birth of their son, the adorable Black Prince.

Please join Weekend in wishing Edward III a very happy and very healthy 680th birthday.

TRENDS

STORY BY CHRISTINA CARBAJAL • PHOTOS BY CARY CONOVER

Ethnic clothing, obscure German beers, Birkenstocks, "The Ren & Stimpy Show" and Pearl Jam.

Could these be the top picks of K-State students?

Peri seems to think they are. Peri, or Periscope, is the all-knowing, all-seeing "eye" that Newsweek magazine relies on for everything that is hip.

In one early October article, Peri laid down the law concerning the latest trends on college campuses across this great land. The article explored trends in clothing, drinks, television and music, prompting us to ask if K-State is up to date or if Peri is out of touch.

Some of the article's predictions had some basic elements of truth, however, especially in the clothing, music and beverage categories.

In the clothes category, Peri noted trends from ethnic clothing to the all-American look.

Lin Rose, owner of Krystallo's, said she's seen an increased interest in ethnic clothing for both men and women.

Clothes made of natural fibers and jewelry are selling well, as well as other clothing and accessories from countries such as Guatemala, Africa and Asia, she said.

At a similar shop, On the Wildside, the ethnic look is also a hot pick. The store offers belts and knitted or embroidered hats from Guatemala, said employee Scott Finkeldei, senior in political science.

"Not everyone does it, because if you do wear it, you do look a little different," he said.

Ethnic clothing may be on the rise, but as Peri noted, American-influenced clothing is still going strong among college students.

Peri said wool baseball caps were popular, but to mention other sports clothing.

Devon Turley, junior in sociology and criminal justice, said he succumbed to the fitted-hat trend.

He said he didn't really pay attention to the trend until everyone started wearing them.

"It's easy to roll out of bed and throw one on," Turley said. "I've even seen lots of girls wearing them."

For the less athletic-oriented clothes buyer, Peri picked seamless jeans, which don't have the usual seam running along the outside of the pant leg.

Particularly in Manhattan, there is a definite country-western influence in clothing. Some female students wear mock boots, which only reach to the ankles.

Other students wear flannel shirts, with an origin in hard-working rural areas and the Gibran Diab, junior at Hutchinson High School, looks for a hat with a K-State insignia. Ballard's Sporting Goods in Aggieville sells hats with logos of many college and professional teams.

A popular alternative to wearing traditional boots is mock boots, which only reach the ankles.

Streetside Records in Aggieville features a display of music from Seattle bands.

colder states.

This country-western style is apparent not only in clothing, but it's emerging into the music mainstream and college-aged listeners. This trend is one that Peri Picks passed over.

Streetside Records employee Dan Clark said Garth Brooks is a big influence in that area.

"He's done a lot for country music," Clark said. "He's crossed over into pop music with a kind of country-rock sound."

Sam Goody employees said country music sales are definitely up.

"It's kind of like an 'Urban Cowboy II' phase," employee James Post said.

"It's not that rockabilly sound anymore. They sing about different things now, not just about their lost dog, cat, wife or their truck that just broke down," Post said.

Country isn't the mainstay, however.

Peri picked bands such as Seattle's Soundgarden, Pearl Jam and Nirvana and New York's Sonic Youth as current favorites.

Clark said he has seen both areas of music selling well at the store.

While music trends are constantly in flux, one constant in the life of college students is beer.

Peri crowned domestic Samuel Adams beer from Boston along with just about any imported beer as highly preferred among college students. This pick received mixed reviews from area liquor stores.

Employees at one store said they have sold quite a bit of imported beer. But since imports are more expensive, with a six-pack costing more than a domestic 12-pack, most people don't buy it very often.

However, Kent Dean, owner of Dean's Retail Liquor, said German beers are big among older college students.

"The thing that I see the most is that trends in the United States or Kansas have nothing to do with what's going on here in Aggieville," he said.

Dean summed it up when he said trends differ no matter where you go.

After all, isn't that what trends are all about? Seeing what everyone is wearing or doing — following the trend, ignoring it or starting something totally different.

The fun part is seeing what's to come next.

Film's plot defines the meaning of 'roommate from hell'

TED KADAU JR.
Collegian

If you like your roommate, take him or her to "Single White Female," and you'll like them even more when you walk out.

If you don't like your roommate, go together anyway, and you'll learn to like him or her by the time you stumble out.

Directed by Barbet Schroeder, "Single White Female" has that rare quality of taking something familiar and sending it straight to hell.

The story revolves around Allie (Bridget Fonda), a young entrepreneur who has just moved to New York in hopes of breaking into the computer-programing business. She has more troubles than a 50-year-old blues musician.

First, she learns her fiancé, Sam, has slept with his ex-wife, and then it dawns on her that her computer business is struggling. So, after kicking her fiancé out of the apartment, she makes what could well be the biggest mistake of her life. She finds a roommate.

Enter Hedra.

Jennifer Jason Leigh, who, in top form as the seemingly quiet new roommate, puts forth what could well be the best performance of her career.

After she moves in, Hedra and Allie become best friends. The companionship is just what Allie needs, and you soon learn it's something Hedra can't live without.

The suspense starts when Allie decides to take back her ex. Hedra quickly proves she's the jealous type, and after all is said and done, the body count is high, and even the family dog isn't safe.

The true quality of "Single White Female" is in its fantastic use of setting. The set does a nice job of conveying a deep sense of the loneliness of a woman all alone in the vast city, living in a large, ancient apartment.

The performances are credible, especially those by Fonda and Leigh. The two make what could have been a quirky film into one that keeps you on the edge of your chair, whimpering for the next scene.

"Single White Female" plays at 7 and 9:30 p.m. today and Saturday in the K-State Union Forum Hall, and at 7 p.m. Sunday in the Union Little Theatre.

Clinton lists priorities

"I'm just going to give you my best effort every day."

He spoke quietly and seriously throughout most of the 40-minute, nationally televised question-and-answer session. But he took a few occasions to joke and one to angrily denounce the Bush-administration search of his State Department passport files during the campaign.

If he hears of people doing anything like that, he said, "I will fire them the next day."

Clinton shed little new light on his agenda, but he did offer a portrait of his priorities in the economic and foreign policy arenas and a glimpse at some of the steps he is likely to take in his first days as president.

Clinton said he would lift the Bush-administration ban on abortion counseling at federally funded clinics and revise Bush's Haiti policy to allow refugees to petition for political refugee status.

Haitians are now summarily returned to their country.

On the economy, he said he remained committed to his campaign pledge to offer a middle-class tax cut; to provide an investment tax credit for new factories and equipment, which he predicted would create 500,000 jobs in his first year; and to accelerate spending on infrastructure work he said would create more jobs.

"I expect to keep the focus on these economic issues," he said.

"The American people understand that these problems are of long duration, and there won't be any overnight miracles. But I think they expect aggressive and prompt action, and I'm going to give it to them."

Debate runs late

"We can't match the resources of schools we play against," she said. "We work for you guys; we'd appreciate what you can do for us."

Not all open-period speakers favored the bill, however.

Mary Wilson, graduate student in statistics, said she thought the University's priorities are out of line if athletics are its biggest mission.

"I'm willing to go into debt to get an education to go out and be a professional, but I'm not willing to go into debt to buy hamburgers and helmets for people," she said, referring to the portion of the fee allocated to sports clubs.

Basketball player Leah Honeycutt, senior in marketing, said she is at K-State first and foremost for an education.

"It just so happens my athletic skills brought me here," she said.

Athletic Director Milt Richards said, "If we do not get this fee increase, then we are in trouble. We've worked hard to raise money. We are capped out."

Complete coverage of Thursday's Senate meeting will appear in Monday's Collegian.

TRADE WARS

Kansas wheat gluten producer urges tariffs

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ATCHISON — The United States should follow through on its threat of punitive tariffs on European gluten imports, says a spokesman for the country's top wheat gluten producer.

"We are very much for the proposed tariff or some other form of sanction against European producers — anything that would create a more level playing field," said Steve Pickman, public relations director of Midwest Grain Products Inc., of Atchison.

"We feel it could have come sooner, but we're grateful action was finally taken," he said.

Pickman said Midwest Grain is the largest of the country's three producers of gluten, a grain product used primarily in breadstuffs to bind ingredients.

European Community negotiators plan to meet with their U.S. counterparts within a week to try to avert a trade war under terms of the General Agreement of Tariffs and Trade, or GATT.

The United States has demanding cuts in subsidies paid to farmers in the 12-nation trading bloc. Britain, Germany and others have urged compromise, while France has pressed for retaliation.

The Bush administration has given the EC until Dec. 5 to resolve the dispute or face import taxes on $300 million worth of European products.

The United States and other nations argue the subsidies keep European farm prices unfairly low in world markets.

The United States has threatened to impose a 200-percent tariff on European gluten. The United States now imposes an 8-percent duty on gluten imported for food and 4 percent on gluten for non-food use.

The EC imposes a 95-percent duty on U.S. gluten and highly subsidizes its gluten producers to keep prices low.

U.S. gluten imports have grown from 881,600 pounds in 1985 to more than 33.4 million pounds in 1990, with 20 percent coming from Europe, according to congressional sources.

Poet Nye has global vision recently published poetry anthology "This Same Sky," which she edited.

She collected poems from writers around the globe, she said, in attempt to broaden the focus of poetry beyond the United States.

"It's really important for students to have a context on how they view the world," she said in a brief interview after the reading.

"This country really thinks it is the center of the world's literary history, which is ridiculous."

She read selections from Bulgaria, Turkey and Armenia and covered themes ranging from the contents of a young boy's head to a plea for ending the hatred between Arabs and Jews in the Middle East.

Nye stressed that neither poetry nor fiction rules the world of literature.

She continued the reading with her works from her own collections, "Different Ways to Pray," "Hugging the Jukebox" and

"Yellow Glove."

With the poem "Feather," Nye displayed her strength adding realistic ethnic flavor, such as Japanese and Mexican, to her poems without being condescending.

Nye has won many awards, including the Pushcart Prize, and her work appeared in many publications, including the "New American Poets of the '80s" collection.

Heller said Nye was the English department's final visiting writer of the semester.

Out-of-control love machine needs to be turned off

YOU'RE ASKING ME?

by Cassandra Duveaux

DEAR CASSANDRA,

I am having this problem that is bothering me even though it doesn't really affect me personally. Let me explain.

My roommate goes down to the "ville" every weekend, and like clockwork he will bring home a different "lady friend" when the bars close. The problem is that "Dr. Love" has recently told me that he has contracted genital warts. However, this was a month ago, and he still continues with his weekend escapades without concern for his partners' well-being.

Cassandra, my roommate is a hazard to society and must be stopped. Please give me some advice, so that I may turn this out-of-control love machine off.

Socially Concerned

DEAR SOCIALLY CONCERNED,

This is alarming, and you should be concerned. You have already done one positive thing, however, and that is bring attention to the topic by writing your letter. Ask him to read this column.

Now, do another by expressing your concern to your roommate. Suggest that he go to Lafene for medical treatment and advice on how to avoid transmitting this communicable disease, as well as avoiding contracting other, more serious, sexually transmitted diseases.

Your roommate's penchant for unprotected sex will catch up with him some day, quite possibly costing him his life.

If your roommate, after all of the above, refuses to discontinue this capricious behavior, then do his next "lady friend" a favor and tell her, point blank, he has contracted genital warts. You will probably lose a roommate, but at least you will have saved one person some misery.

DEAR CASSANDRA,

I have learned in the Collegian that a bike is a car, bikes cannot go where pedestrians go, and bikes should keep as far to the right on the roadway as possible with cars flying on the left.

My question is, how does a bike make a left turn?

Bike Rider

DEAR BIKE RIDER,

Very carefully.

Stay as far right as possible when you are on the roadway. Before you reach the point at which you wish to make a left turn, give the hand signal for making a left-hand turn. Then, after making sure the lane you are in is clear, pull over to the left side of the lane. Complete your left turn at the desired point when the opposing lane is clear. Maintain your hand signal until you have completed the turn.

We see more bicyclists on the road nowadays than ever before. We must all, therefore, show more respect for the rights of others on the road. However, as a cyclist, you have to keep in mind that all the respect in the world is not going to keep a 1,000-pound mass of steel and rubber from killing you in an accident. You and the bicycle are going to lose every time. So, drive defensively.

DEAR CASSANDRA,

I hope a lot of other students are going to take the advice of Solutions Are Us and go to the Union Station Friday night. I know I'm going to try to be there. Thanks for the suggestion!

By the way, Cassandra, I think you're doing a great service for K-State. You column allows students to speak their minds or ask questions without risking embarrassment from people they know. Everything is anonymous. Keep up the good work!

P.S. to S.C., I'm not doing anything Saturday night. What did you have in mind?

Still Waiting

DEAR STILL WAITING,

Wait no longer. Friday is here. Have fun, and thanks for the kind words. Do me a favor, and tell the Collegian editors I need a staff.

Letters to Cassandra may be submitted in person or by mail to the Kansas State Collegian, c/o Cassandra Duveaux, Kedzie Hall 106, Manhattan, KS 66506.

Cassandra reserves the right to edit the content for the purpose of conserving space. Unless otherwise specified, all letters will be open to the public. Correspondence designated as "private" or "not for publication" will be maintained in the strictest confidence.

The advice presented in this column is solely the opinion of the columnist and does not reflect the opinion of the Collegian or K-State.

Alumni Rodeo a 35-year tradition at K-State

STORY BY

Clowns, bulls and participants turned out in full force Saturday and Sunday for the K-State Rodeo Club's annual Alumni Rodeo in Weber Arena.

From goat tying to bull riding, the rodeo had about 90 entries in nine events.

Fort Scott Community College and K-State co-sponsor the rodeo each fall. Eligible contestants include students, alumni and spouses from both schools.

Shawna Stevens, senior in broadcast journalism and Rodeo Club secretary, said clubs choose the other state club with which to sponsor a match. She said K-State and Fort Scott have worked together over the years because they are located near each other.

Rodeo Club President Carrie Sharp, senior in animal sciences and industry, said the alumni rodeo has been going on for about 35 years.

REDEFINING K-STATE ACADEMICS

Departments may merge

Community planning, landscape architecture have similar goals

KARREY BRITT

Collegian

EDITOR'S NOTE: The Kansas Board of Regents has called for new Role and Aspirations Statements from each state university. Today, the Collegian begins a look at what each college at K-State is doing to fulfill this mandate.

The departments of Landscape Architecture and Regional and Community Planning may be combined.

The College of Architecture and Design has proposed this merger as part of its Role and Aspirations report.

Regional and community planning is a graduate program only. Six students are now enrolled.

"By merging these departments, we could offer a bachelor's degree in landscape architecture, a master's degree in landscape architecture and a master's degree in RCP," said Dennis Law, head of the landscape architecture department and chairman of the College Core Committee.

"This would allow us to offer more sufficient graduate degrees, and it would be easier for the students to get a dual degree in these areas."

Other faculty members said they agree with Law that merging the departments would be good for the college.

"The departments are closely tied together," said Ray Weisenburger, professor of regional and community planning.

"Landscape is involved with the physical aspect, whereas planners are more interested in the social science aspect. They are groups with the same goals but different capabilities."

Stephanie Rolley, assistant professor of landscape architecture and adjunct professor of RCP, said a merger would make things easier for the faculty.

"Merging the departments together will formalize what is going on," she said. "Right now, faculty members are working in both departments."

The college would also like to see an increase in faculty salaries, Law said.

EDITOR'S NOTE: This is the first in a four-part series taking a look at the campaigns and plans of area candidates who did not win their races Nov. 3.

Republican Jim Van Slyke knew the cards were stacked against him from the beginning in his quest to unseat U.S. Representative Jim Slattery, D-Kan., in the 2nd District.

But he still had hope.

"We knew it was going to be an uphill battle," Van Slyke said. "If there was a year to defeat the incumbent, this was the year. Everyone agreed that Congress needed reform."

Kansas voters, however, decided the incumbent was the one for the

STUDENT SENATE

Athletic Fee hike passes in wee hours

AMY WRIGHT

Collegian

Tired and talked out, senators passed the Athletic Fee enhancement bill shortly before adjourning at 4 a.m. Friday.

The bill will raise athletic fees to $17 per semester for full-time students and $8.50 for part-time students. Fees are now $10 for full-time students and $3.50 for part-time students.

The increase is scheduled to take effect in the fall of 1993, said Fred Wingert, student representative on the Intercollegiate Athletic Council and junior in business administration.

The bill passed after several attempts by Arts and Sciences Sens. David Frese and Ed Skoog to propose alternate legislation failed.

Frese introduced legislation calling for an increase in the Athletic Fee to $25 and free admission to all sports events at K-State.

"This would benefit all students where the original legislation benefits a select few," he said.

Frese's proposal failed by a voice vote.

Skoog proposed an amendment to put the issue to a campus-wide referendum Dec. 1 and 2. It failed on a vote of 18-35.

Arts and Sciences Sen. Darby Wallace questioned the wisdom of that move.

"What gives the average student the knowledge we have?" Wallace asked Skoog.

"I know they pay a lot more than us collectively," Skoog said. "I think there would be a strong turnout."

Athletic Director Milt Richards said he thought the majority of Senate favored the bill all along.

"I'm glad people had the courage to stay and do it," he said.

NEWS DIGEST

► LITHUANIA MAY BE COMMUNIST AGAIN

VILNIUS, Lithuania (AP) — The first republic to break away from the Soviet Union appeared Sunday to be on the verge of returning former Communists to power in a bitterly contested parliamentary election.

Lithuanian voters angered by factory shutdowns, soaring prices and lack of hot water said as they left the polls that they were ready to give the former Communists a chance to restore economic order.

Leaders of the former Lithuanian Communist Party, now called the Democratic Labor Party, promised that if they won, they would safeguard Lithuania's independence and continue to build a Western-style market economy.

But they also said they would improve trade relations with Russia and demand better terms from the International Monetary Fund, which has forced Lithuania to freeze government wages and hold down public spending in return for Western loans.

Turnout appeared light in the 61 districts where runoffs were necessary because no candidate won a majority in the first round of voting three weeks ago. About 70 percent of Lithuania's 2.5 million eligible voters turned out in the first round.

► MAN MAY HAVE EXPOSED KIDS TO HIV

ROSEBURG, Ore. (AP) — A man has been indicted on attempted murder charges for allegedly exposing at least five children to the AIDS virus by having unprotected sex with them, authorities said Saturday.

The indictment, filed Friday in Circuit Court, charges Adam Brown, 30, of Roseburg, with attempted murder, sodomy, rape, sexual penetration with a foreign object, and reckless endangerment, said Bill Marshall, senior deputy district attorney.

Brown was to be arraigned today, Marshall said.

According to the indictment, Brown sexually abused nine children, having unprotected sex with five of them while knowing he had tested positive for HIV, the virus that causes AIDS.

Brown, who worked as a secretary at Umpqua Community College, had known he had the HIV virus for at least a year, Marshall said.

Authorities said the nine children were enrolled at a day-care center that wasn't identified. Brown, who was a lay minister at a church not connected to the center, used that position to gain trust at the center, authorities said.

He was arrested Oct. 6, a few days after an 8-year-old boy told his mother he had been assaulted.

Campus campaign for United Way closes in on goal

"The shelters are seeing entire families come through the door looking for assistance, not just transient people — families that are just barely hanging on and can't make ends meet."

AILLEEN CRAY

ANN DOOCY

Collegian

K-State has reached 85 percent of its campaign goal for the United Way.

Shane Isaacson, United Way student representative and junior in journalism and mass communications, said the goal of the campaign is to raise $1 per student.

"The students have been really helpful and supportive. They believe in what we're doing," he said.

Isaacson said when he first got involved in the United Way coordinating committee for K-State, he had no idea how many students the United Way helps.

"Students make up one-third of the people being helped by the (Flint Hills) Breadbasket, and over three-fifths of the Crisis Center," he said. "Your classmates or even your roommate could be getting help, and you'd never know."

Aillean Cray, executive director of Riley County United Way, said the image of poor people is changing.

"The shelters are seeing entire families come through the door looking for assistance, not just transient people — families that are just barely hanging on and can't make ends meet," she said.

Cray said the Riley County goal is $500,000, and the campaign has been extended for a short period of time.

"We never really close it off, but we are running behind from where we were last year," she said.

"People this year are being affected by the economy, and it's really sad, because this is the time when our agencies need the most help."

Cray said no contribution is too small.

"The bottom line is that when the monies don't come in, the one that gets hurt is the person that needs help, and unfortunately the numbers are growing," she said.

Stompin' to the beat

Step show lets greeks visit, show group spirit

KRISTEEN YOUNG
Collegian

As smoke rose from the stage, nine men in red shirts twirled red and white-striped canes.

They stomped to the beat of the music before a crowd of about 1,000.

They were members of Kappa Alpha Psi fraternity from Central Missouri State University who had come to compete in Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity's Neak Frasty Stomp Down '92 Saturday night in Ahearn Field House.

Their three-hour drive was worth it, as they took home the first-place trophy in the step show's fraternity division and $400 in prize money.

Their journey to Manhattan was also a chance to reunite with fraternity brothers at K-State.

"The step show gave fraternities and sororities a chance to visit each other," said K-State Alpha Phi Alpha president Jayson Strickland, senior in elementary education.

"Being in school all the time, sometimes they need an excuse to visit each other and they get to show their fraternity or sorority spirit."

The CMSU Kappas beat out four other fraternities, but Strickland said the scoring had been close.

"The general comment from people there was that the quality of the steps improved from last year, because they prepared longer anticipating more teams and a bigger crowd this year," he said.

Ten teams competed this year, up two from last year, and the crowd size doubled compared to last year.

K-State's chapter of Omega Psi Phi placed second. Known as the "Ques," they stepped in camouflage pants and gold combat boots.

Third place went to the CMSU chapter of Alpha Phi Alpha.

The other two teams competing in the men's division were K-State's Delta Upsilon and the Wichita State University chapter of Phi Beta Sigma.

CRAIG HACKER/Collegian

Members of Delta Sigma Theta sorority step at the Alpha Phi Alpha Stomp Down '92 Saturday night in Ahearn Field House. The group of five took first place in the sorority division.

It was the first time in the step show for the DUs, the only fraternity competing from the Interfraternity Council. Stepping was something new to them.

"It's not something that the predominantly white fraternities usually do, and we wanted to experience something new," DU member Jeff Peebler, senior in arts and sciences, said.

"Our adviser, Bernard Franklin, (assistant dean of student life), and another member taught us some steps, and then we put most of it together ourselves. We were proud of that."

In the sorority division, the winning trophy and $400 went to K-State's Delta Sigma Theta sorority.

The Deltas took the stage in black and white pinstriped slacks, suspenders and red ties.

They imitated fraternity steps, twirling canes like the Kappas and barking like the "Ques."

Second place went to the Zeta Phi Betas of K-State.

Last year's defending champions, the K-State chapter of Alpha Kappa Alpha, took third.

Other steppers in the women's division were the Deltas from the University of Missouri at Kansas City and K-State's Kappa Alpha Theta chapter.

The teams were rated by a panel of nine judges. Each of the National Pan-Hellenic Councils were represented on the panel by an alumni member chosen from each local chapter.

An additional judge was chosen from K-State faculty and staff.

Up to 10 points were available in each of four categories: crowd appeal, stage presence, creativity and appearance.

To be creative, some teams used special effects.

The winning Kappas used smoke from a fog machine and during their performance, they handed roses to women in the crowd as a slow song played.

The women of Alpha Kappa Alpha used a revolving sign that said: "Alpha Kappa Alpha, it's all the greek you need to know."

The teams that used canes spun them around their backs, twirled them on their fingers and pounded them on the ground.

Strickland said the step show has gained popularity on campus, and the groups are looking forward to perhaps one in the spring sponsored by another organization.

THE PRESIDENTIAL TRANSITION

Clinton meets with leaders of Congress

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. — In their first meeting Sunday night, President-elect Clinton and Democratic congressional leaders talked over their "new beginning" as they tried to forge agreement on a quick-action agenda and breaking Washington gridlock.

"We talked about a lot of subjects ... in terms of a good, new beginning next year," Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell said after the 3 1/2-hour session over dinner at the Arkansas governor's mansion.

Mitchell, who flew in with House Speaker Tom Foley and House Majority Leader Richard Gephardt, steered clear of divulging specifics of the meeting, promising instead a full report today at a news conference with Clinton.

"It was a very, very positive meeting," said George Stephanopoulos, Clinton's communications director. "We now have a president and a Congress who are ready to work together on the same priorities for the American people."

Before the leaders arrived, Clinton said: "We've got a big job to do, and we've got to do it together." He, too, declined to outline specific priorities.

It was their first meeting since Clinton's victory. The opportunities were big, as this marks the first time Democrats will have control over both the White House and Congress in 12 years.

Clinton and his aides have talked of a 100-day agenda for economic and social matters they believed were neglected over the past decade. But even before Sunday night's dinner, Mitchell downplayed expectations for how quickly Congress might move.

"I am not one to subscribe to this 100-day deadline business," Mitchell said on NBC-TV's "Meet the Press."

"I think it's an artificial deadline established for no purpose other than giving definition ... to a sense of urgency about action," Mitchell said. "And so I don't use any particular time frame for when we should or should not act."

Stephanopoulos said the 100-day timetable "is a little artificial but it helps to organize your thinking."

"Whether it's in the first 100 days is not important. We're going to start on day one."

Mitchell said he would tell Clinton he's on track by making economic revival his top priority.

Clinton plans to make a short-term economic stimulus package his No. 1 objective, including expanded investment tax credits hoped to spark job creation.

Other parts of it Clinton can do by executive order, like speeding up federal dollars for highway projects that would create jobs.

Clinton met at the governor's mansion Sunday with economic adviser Robert Reich.

The bulk of Clinton's long-term economic plan — a $20-billion annual investment in infrastructure, technology and communications — relies on defense cuts and tax hikes on the wealthy that would require congressional action.

During his campaign, Clinton also pledged to seek quick action on family-leave legislation that President Bush vetoed twice.

Some legislation — such as complicated and controversial health-care reform — Clinton has merely talked of getting to Congress within 100 days.

Senate Minority Leader Bob Dole, who also appeared on "Meet the Press," cautioned the next president not to overload the circuit with too much legislation in the first few months in office.

Dole said Republicans would try to cooperate on an economic stimulus package, but they also would keep a watchful eye to make sure Clinton's plan dealt with deficit reduction.

'Sex' Madonna's next shocker

THE ISSUE

Madonna's new book is an attempt at art that only succeeds at being commercial fluff.

What more do you need to sell 500,000 plus books in one week than pictures of 84 nipples, 39 alternative uses for Vanilla Ice and a penis?

Nothing. At least when your name is Madonna.

Media megastar Madonna has again shown that sex not only sells, but sells well when it concerns her.

"Sex," the latest product of the Material Girl, is the highlight of Madonna's 10-year marketing career of herself. One-half of a million copies getting shipped overseas are individually numbered and designated to be collector's items.

The making of the book was even more of a secret than the "Batman" movies. An alarm system and eight guards protected the book during its production and press procedures.

And the media got excited.

As soon as Madonna released her album "Erotica," people waited for her book.

Speculations and rumors flew while the world waited for "Sex" to reveal itself. At one time, even the FBI was apparently involved, after photographs were stolen and offered to the London tabloid News of the World.

In terms of quality and usefulness, "Sex" is certainly lacking. Sure, the picture quality is not bad and the book has nice metal covers. But people who hope to learn from Madonna's sex shows are better advised to pick up the next issue of "Hustler."

Madonna running to and fro in her birthday suit is more about money and making herself a media goddess than it is about art.

And looking at women with shaved heads and men in dog collars is akin to watching dead fish.

Congratulations to Madonna for finding the glamour switch. But woe to anyone who hopes to garner a deeper insight into humanity by perusing her book.

Feminists directly responsible for the family downfall

Radical thinking undermining the fabric of our society

Earlier this semester, a professor wrote that I should change my values because they were wrong. He knew this because God Himself had told him so.

Like this professor, many in this "Year of the Woman" are challenging "traditional" ideas about masculinity and femininity.

A friend recently told me an interesting story about an advising session that illustrates this shift in thinking. This meeting was the first between my friend, whom we'll call Kim, and her adviser.

To begin, the adviser asked Kim what she wanted to do in life. Kim responded by explaining that she mainly wanted to be a wife, mother and a homemaker. If she had to work, Kim would like to work in an antique store. But she really wanted to focus on her family.

Her adviser then laughed in disbelief and rudely assured Kim that they would find her a career. Kim again assured her adviser that she really didn't want a career. After being sufficiently belittled, Kim dropped the issue.

I know I speak for many women by stating that I'm tired of "enlightened" feminists treating women who want to raise a family and build a strong marriage, instead of seeking prestigious careers, with nothing but disrespect. I do not have a vendetta against women who want to pursue a career; in fact, I deeply respect women who persevere in often hostile working environments. Conversely, I hope career women can view homemakers as productive and valuable instead of backwards and stupid.

Feminists claim that the Western tradition based on the Judeo-Christian ethic is thoroughly sexist. Their favorite example is the line in the Bible that states that wives should submit to their husbands. Curiously, they forget to quote other lines like "Husband, love your wife," and the feminists ignore how respectfully Christ Himself, not Himself, treated women.

Regardless of feminist claims, submissiveness is neither sexist nor demeaning. Submissiveness presupposes the fact that the husband will be worthy of being followed. A marriage is an organization of two where a constant struggle for leadership will only result in bitterness and misery.

Men may have more responsibility in the traditional model of marriage, yet they aren't complaining. This is because modern America teaches us that power, control and leadership will make you a successful person. Feminists don't want equal rights, they want extra rights, especially if they involve ruling over men. Submissiveness obviously isn't about control. It's about giving, sacrificing and selflessness, values our society scoffs at.

So why should wives and not husbands submit? First, it will lead to healthy marriages. Second, women are probably more equipped to submit and follow than men are. In her book, "In a Different Voice," psychological researcher Carol Gilligan asserts that the ideas of separation and achievement seem more rooted in the masculine nature while involvement, attachment and invitation belong more clearly to the feminine identity.

The differences between men and women extend far beyond socialization, or even the physical, into our very core and soul. These differences should not be attacked, but celebrated. So many in the feminist and more liberal camp are preaching tolerance and an appreciation of diversity. Yet when it comes to gender issues, the same people hypocritically attack inherent diversity between men and women because they feel our concept of gender is based solely on the evil Western tradition.

"Progressive" feminist thinking in America has contributed to a 50% divorce rate and a general breakdown in the family. It's time to readdress our thinking and focus on ideas that have worked in the past, not for the sake of "tradition," but for healthy and functional marriages and families.

HIV TESTING

Using state labs could save students money

Editor,

I would like to draw attention to some problems regarding Lafene's HIV testing procedure. Lafene charges a costly sum of $28 to test for HIV. Watkins Student Health Center at the University of Kansas charges $18.50 for its test, and the Riley County Health Department charges only $15.

Lafene also requires the students to make an appointment to consult with a doctor before he or she can take the test. I don't think the doctor should be involved in the student's choice to take the test.

Lafene puts a record of the test in your student health file, which leaves little room for confidentiality. Both Watkins and Riley Co. offer a strictly confidential test done on a "walk-in" basis. It appears to me that Lafene is lagging in the areas of cost, convenience and confidentiality.

Lafene has informed me that the HIV test record can be removed if the students health file needs to be sent elsewhere. Why does Lafene bother keeping record of the test if they anticipate having to remove it? Lafene chooses to use a private lab here in Manhattan which adds to the high cost of its test. Riley Co. and Watkins use a state-operated lab in Topeka. The state lab's services cost less than the private lab, which reflects in the overall cost.

According to the director of Student Health at KSU state labs are available to Lafene. However, Lafene is bound by contract to the privately-owned Peterson Lab. He also stated that Peterson Lab was more convenient to use. Lafene should try to be more convenient for the students it was intended to serve rather than convenience for their own purposes. Lafene should not renew its contract and should take advantage of the state labs.

Students pay $80 per semester toward Lafene which adds up to an excess of $1.5 million. With this money and the cheaper costs of using a state lab, why couldn't Lafene go even further to accommodate its students? I would strongly suggest that Lafene offer one free HIV test per semester to those students who wish to take the test.

JAPANESE CULTURE

Misquotes may lead to wrong conclusions

Editor,

My workshop on Japanese culture was conducted on Nov. 6 as part of Asian-American Awareness Month. I appreciate your attention, and I believe your coverage in the Collegian serves well the whole purpose of the on-going awareness activities. There are a couple of points in the Nov. 10 article, however, which I am afraid could be misleading.

My statement about "stress and burnout" among Japanese businessmen was misunderstood and therefore misquoted. While many Japanese businessmen encounter stress and burnout in their late 40s, this condition should not be confused with the term "karoshi," which means "death from exhaustion."

On average, the Japanese businessmen who actually experienced serious burnout developed their stress-related illnesses before they reached the age of 50. That does not mean that they retired at that early point in their career.

As for the giving of Valentine chocolates, when the custom was introduced in Japan, it was easily appreciated because it fits the Japanese pattern of giving gifts to express appreciation and/or affection. The issue is not whether Japanese give chocolate out of obligation or love. What is important is that Valentine's Day has been added to their calendar as one of the gift-giving occasions and that the giving of gifts to colleagues and bosses at work on that day has become customary.

At the workshop, I tried to say that any talk about a specific culture is prone to overgeneralization and oversimplification, which often lead to cultural stereotypes. In my opinion, what we should be doing in order to understand a culture is to try to collect as much information as possible and to describe it the best that we can. I am not expert in Japanese culture, and, for that reason, I thank everyone who attended the workshop and provided opinions, thoughts and information about it. I hope the workshop was a learning opportunity for them. It certainly was for me.

CHRISTMAS

Nothing wrong with Santa in October

Editor,

I am writing this letter in response to John Hawks' apparent misunderstanding and lack of appreciation for the most wonderful season — the season of Christmas.

As I sit here, with 41 days until Christmas I wonder why he has such a "Scrooged" opinion about this holiday. You see, for me, Christmas began long ago. Yes, my tree is up, my lights are on, and Christmas melodies warm up my decorated apartment.

There are some of us out here who believe in the true meaning of the holiday. We believe in the spirit of it, not the materialistic side. To me, Christmas is a time for giving, a time of families, a time of love, and most importantly, a time of hope. Why, then, wouldn't I want to start celebrating early?

I am not asking John Hawks to conform into Santa's helper or anything. I am just asking him to let those of us who don't mistletoe in October or eggnog in November to enjoy the warmth it brings us.

HUNGER

Giving a can can help vanquish silent killer

Editor,

It has been called the invisible killer. The silent emergency. This killer is called hunger.

That's right, hunger. And it is no longer a world problem. Hunger affects us right here in Manhattan, even at K-State. Do you know that 10 percent of the K-State population uses some type of hunger shelter? The Flint Hills Breadbasket serves some 6,000 families, one-third from K-State.

I want to persuade you to help out the students and organizations at K-State in their efforts to supply food to the needy. By donating one can of food you can help feed a family.

There are many programs that can help the needy, and one is the 30 Days of Thanksgiving effort. Be a caring friend to one of your fellow students or a family in need. Give a can.

One thing can be said for the disappointing presidential commission recommendation that women continue to be banned from most combat positions in the U.S. military: The timing was appropriate.

Even as the sharply divided commission was taking its vote, the American people were taking theirs — turning out of office the president who stacked the 15-member commission with people opposed to allowing women to hold combat assignments.

As a result, it hardly matters now what the commission decided to recommend to George Bush. He may act on the commission's proposals, but ultimately the decision about where women serve in the U.S. armed forces will belong to Bill Clinton.

Under the commission's recommendation, women would be allowed to serve on some Navy combat ships, but would continue to be banned not only from ground combat units but from air combat positions as well.

The panel made a legitimate point when it observed that military readiness rather than gender equality "should be the driving concern regarding assignment policies." And there may be good reasons for not opening all combat assignments to women. It will take another study, however, to make that case in a convincing fashion — if it can be made at all.

Star Tribune, Minneapolis

For President-elect Clinton's sake, and even more for our own, we must all pray that his confidence in himself is well founded. We must hope that his ideas to improve the economy are well based. We must hope that he can, indeed, provide an injection of renewed belief in America as an engine of prosperity and a bastion of justice. Part of the price we should ask for the loan of our highest office is an honest accounting of the recipient's effort.

Programs are fine. Inspiring others in public matters is best of all.

Name change protested

Students say Mark Twain may have been racist, is misrepresentative

"The students have too many questions about him. Was he or wasn't he a racist?"

HARTFORD, Conn. — Student protesters at a junior college said they oppose plans to rename their school after Mark Twain.

The writer and humorist lived in Hartford from 1874 until 1891. His former residence houses the Mark Twain Memorial, a privately run museum.

About 50 students at Greater Hartford Community College who protested Friday said they were uncomfortable about Twain's treatment of black people in books such as "Huckleberry Finn."

That story describes the relationship between young Huck and Jim, the slave he befriends.

Samuel Clemens, who took the pseudonym Mark Twain, died in 1910.

"The students have too many questions about him," said Ania Noel, a student at the technical college. "Was he or wasn't he a racist?"

Charles Darling, professor of English and a poet, suggested honoring Twain for his ties to Hartford, his interest in 19th-century technology and his concern for all races.

"In large measure, Mark Twain became the conscience of America, often reminding the country of its roots in democracy and its belief in the sovereignty of the common citizen," Darling wrote to trustees.

"Mark Twain does not represent who's in this region," said Renae Evans, 25.

Half the students at Greater Hartford Community College are black or Hispanic, and 30 different ethnic groups are represented.

David Sloane, a University of New Haven professor and president of a national circle of Twain scholars, said Twain paid for black students to attend college and made "visionary statements" advocating racial tolerance.

The board of trustees for the two-year state college is scheduled to vote on a name change today.

FFA selects new leadership

National delegates elect Purdue student president

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — National FFA delegates on Saturday elected the six-member team of officers that will lead the organization through 1993.

Travis Park, 20, of Franklin, Ind., was elected president. Park's supervised agricultural experience program was in diversified crop and livestock operation and hay and straw baling.

He is a sophomore in agricultural education at Purdue University, and he will take a year's leave of absence from his studies to serve his term.

Kevin White, 20, of Redding, Calif., was named secretary. White's supervised program was in marketing and breeding swine, agricultural sales and service landscape development.

The central region vice president is John Kleiboeker, 20, of Stotts City, Mo. Kleiboeker raised purebred and commercial beef cattle for his supervised program.

Rick Perkins, 19, of Bloomville, Ohio, is the eastern region vice president. Perkins raises registered Hampshire sheep and crops, and he works on a farm for his supervised program.

Todd Hingson, 19, of Live Oak, Fla., is the southern region vice president. Soybeans, watermelon and tobacco comprised Hingson's supervised program.

The western region vice president is Dennis Degner, 19, of Malone, Texas. Degner's supervised program was a purebred Angus beef cattle operation. He also raises market steers.

DON'T LET HEPATITIS B HAPPEN TO YOU

Five months after graduating from college, 21-year-old Wendy Marx fell into a coma and nearly died from a disease she'd barely heard of. She needed two liver transplants to save her life. Like most college students, Wendy had never thought about hepatitis B.

If you don't get the facts about hepatitis B, you too could contract this serious virus. Your student health center can tell you more about hepatitis B and how to protect yourself from it.

Why should you know about hepatitis B? Because today, young people are at great risk of infection. Hepatitis B is caused by a virus that strikes 300,000 Americans each year. Most are adolescents and young adults.

But the good news is that hepatitis B is preventable. Safe, effective vaccines are available that can protect you from infection. If Wendy Marx had been vaccinated, she would have avoided two liver transplants and years of suffering.

In the case of Wendy Marx and in one-third of those infected, the source of infection may remain unknown. In addition, many people have the disease and never know it. Anyone can get hepatitis B. And anyone who has hepatitis B can spread it to someone else. That someone else may be you. Find out more about hepatitis B and if you should be protected.

BIG 8
CONFERENCE

► IOWA STATE 19 NEBRASKA 10

AMES, Iowa — In what is being touted as one of the biggest upsets in Big Eight football history, the Iowa State Cyclones stunned the No. 7 Nebraska Cornhuskers by beating them at their own game — the run.

The Cyclones piled up 373 rushing yards en route to their first victory against the Huskers since 1977.

Iowa State quarterback Marv Seiler, a fifth-year senior making his first start at quarterback, ran 24 times for 144 yards. In the fourth quarter, he went 78 yards to set up the Cyclones' only touchdown of the game.

But the story of the game was the Cyclone defense.

Iowa State held Nebraska to 246 total yards. The Huskers had been leading the nation in rushing (351.1) and points scored (43.3) a game. Saturday, they managed just 192 rushing yards and one touchdown.

Husker running backs Derek Brown and Calvin Jones, who had been averaging a combined total of 215 yards a game, were held to 156 yards by the Cyclone defense.

Iowa State fullback Chris Ulrich was second on the team in rushing, gaining 105 yards on 17 carries.

Between the two teams, 16 passes were thrown in the game.

Suddenly, Nebraska's train to the Orange Bowl has derailed. The Huskers were a virtual lock for the Jan. 1 contest, with convincing victories against both Colorado and Kansas, but the race has opened up once again.

► COLORADO 25 KANSAS 18

LAWRENCE — The No. 20 Jayhawks Cinderella season is getting worse week by week.

After dropping a 49-7 contest against the Huskers a week ago, KU came home with a chance to climb back into the Orange Bowl race.

But it didn't happen. The No. 13 Buffaloes staged a fourth-quarter comeback — for the eighth time in three years — and scored a touchdown with two minutes to play, giving the Buffs the 25-18 lead.

The Jayhawk defense held Colorado to 18 rushing yards on 41 carries. But Buffalo quarterback Kordell Stewart picked up the slack, connecting on 22 of 34 passes, good for 304 yards.

Wide receiver Charles Johnson caught eight passes for 166 yards.

► OKLAHOMA 15 OKLAHOMA ST. 15

STILLWATER, Okla. — It took a Scott Blanton 27-yard field goal with no time left for Oklahoma to salvage a tie with intrastate rival Oklahoma State.

The Cowboys had kicked a 26-yard field goal to take the lead with 1:19 left.

Sooner quarterback Cale Gundy, who missed the two previous games because of a shoulder injury, appears to be healthy. He threw for 236 yards, connecting on 17 of 28 passes, and led the Sooners to their final score with completions of 10, 20 and 19 yards.

Oklahoma outgained the Cowboys 160-73 through two quarters, but the halftime score was still 9-9.

Wildcats fall to 2-8 Tigers

K-State is 0-5 on the road after 27-14 loss to MU

STEVE ROCK
Collegian

COLUMBIA, Mo. — And the road woes continue.

For the fifth time in as many away games this season, the Cats lost, the latest setback being a 27-14 loss at the hands of the 1-8 Missouri Tigers at Faurot Field Saturday in Columbia, Mo.

Make that 2-8.

"We've got to learn to line up and play wherever we are and understand that the field is still 100 yards long with a couple of goal posts at each end," Wildcat coach Bill Snyder said.

"But we're not mature enough to do that."

The Cats fell to 4-5 on the season, 1-4 in Big Eight play.

The loss to Missouri, who hadn't won a Division I-A game this season before Saturday, was due to emotionless play, defensive tackle Tony Williams said.

"Their record deceived us," he said. "We came into the game knowing that Missouri was going to play hard. But deep down, we knew that this was a 1-8 team that we should beat."

"It didn't happen."

And it didn't happen in more ways than one.

Missouri, who had been averaging just 86 rushing yards a game, 105th in the nation, beat K-State for 130 yards on the ground.

Quarterback Jeff Handy threw for 299 yards and three touchdowns en route to breaking the Big Eight record for passing yards in a season by a sophomore, 2,179.

The Tigers had a season-high seven sacks, dropping quarterback Jason Smargiasso seven times, good for minus-52 yards.

All of Missouri's efforts overshadowed Smargiasso's 225 passing yards, Gerald Benton's 142 receiving yards and J.J. Smith's 111 rushing yards.

Smargiasso, who threw a touchdown pass for the first time since the third game, had a career high for total passing yards.

But he also tossed two interceptions, one coming with five minutes remaining in the game. And although the Tigers didn't score off the turnover, they held the ball for more than three minutes.

"We didn't get the win, and that's the bottom line," Smargiasso said. "It was my fault just as much as anybody's fault."

Benton's 142 receiving yards were a career-high. He had 114 receiving yards after one quarter.

But he also fumbled twice, the second one coming with just 38 seconds remaining in the first half.

Twenty-three seconds later, Handy connected with wide receiver Victor Bailey on a 31-yard touchdown strike, giving the Tigers a 17-7 halftime lead, when the Cats could have conceivably gone into the locker room tied at 10.

Smith, who started in place of senior Eric Gallon, K-State's

CRAIG HACKER/Collegian

Kitt Rawlings, K-State cornerback, struggles to keep Missouri's Victor Bailey from scoring the Tigers' third touchdown of the game early in the third quarter. The touchdown, Bailey's second of the game, gave the Tigers a 23-7 lead.

Fumble overshadows Benton's big day

MIKE MAY
Collegian

COLUMBIA, Mo. — Statistically speaking, Gerald Benton touched the ball nine times on Saturday. He would be happier if that figure was reduced by one.

Late in the second quarter, Benton was near midfield to receive a Missouri punt. But the ball bounced off his helmet, and Missouri recovered.

"The kick was short, and as I was running up for it," Benton said. "My foot got caught in the turf. I ran up on it too fast, and when I got caught, the ball kept coming. I jumped back, and the ball hit me in the helmet."

The fumble gave the Tigers the ball on the K-State 48-yard line. Four plays later, Missouri had a touchdown, a 17-7 lead and the momentum.

"That gave Missouri a boost. I put the defense in a bad spot, and I apologized to the defense," Benton said.

The fumbled punt overshadowed Benton's best receiving day as a Cat. The Bradenton, Fla. native caught five balls for a career-high 142 yards.

On the Wildcats' second possession, Benton caught a 51-yard pass from quarterback Jason Smargiasso to put the Wildcats on the Missouri 38-yard line.

But on a third and 23 play at the Tiger 38, Benton fumbled after making a short reception, halting a seven-play drive which began back at the Wildcat 20.

Benton made up for that fumble in the next series, hauling in another long reception, this time for 49 yards, and putting the Wildcats on the Missouri 8.

Later in that drive, Benton caught a seven-yard touchdown pass to give K-State its only lead of the day at 7-3. The score marked the first for the Wildcats through the air since Oct. 3.

"If I mess up, I try and make up for it," Benton said. "Today as a receiver, I had a great day. Jason threw some nice passes, and the line held up well when we were passing. Everything clicked today."

"It seemed like I played two different games. Offensively, I was doing great, but when I was with the special teams, I was messing up."

Trailing by 13 points with five and a half minutes left, the Wildcats committed one of their four turnovers on the day. With defeat all but sealed, Benton left the sideline and leaned over the bench, alone.

"I was just sitting there thinking about everything that happened," Benton said. "I will remember it as the day I gave Missouri a touchdown."

As for the rest of the season, Benton will have to try and block out the negative which depreciates his best receiving day at K-State. "You have to put it behind you," Benton said, looking down at the floor.

"If I let this worry me now, I won't even be a punt returner anymore. I might as well get with the track team."

Temperatures were around 30 degrees Saturday morning in Ames, Iowa, but that didn't freeze up K-State's runners.

The men's team came out to the Veenker Golf Course, tactically best prepared by Coach John Capriotti, to win and dominate the other 18 schools at the NCAA District V Championships.

Just a half an hour earlier, the women's squad had finished second behind Nebraska. It's the second time in the last six years both teams qualified for the NCAA Championships. The championships will be in one week in Bloomington, Ind.

Capriotti said he was pleased with the efforts of the men's team.

"We finally ran a tactical race one through seven in the way we should have run it," he said. "They ran very controlled at the beginning. Francis O'Neill ran well, and the package guys worked well together. They ran a really smart game plan."

"We had seven guys in the top 25. That's really awesome in a district meet."

Junior O'Neill ran up front as expected, finishing fifth in the 10,000 meters race with a time of 31:21. Moray Annandale of Wichita State, one of the favorites for the individual title in Bloomington, led the entire race and finished with a time of 30:51.

The key for the Cats was the teamwork. Up to almost the four-mile mark, four of K-State's runners ran together for 10th place.

At the end, Chris Unthank, Ryan Clive-Smith, Anthony Williams and Mike Becker controlled the field behind the leading group, finishing 10th, 12th, 13th and 18th, respectively.

The top five finishers of each team add to the total team score.

The Cats won with 58 points, followed in distance by Iowa State with 91 points and Oklahoma State with 105.

Placing Yared Berhane and David Haskell among the top 25, K-State had the best team performance of the year.

With such a deep team, Capriotti said he is looking forward to the NCAA meet.

"They ran a real big, emotional race," he said. "They are looking like a national team right now. I'm really excited about that."

The Cats' second best runner, Unthank, also stressed teamwork.

"It was by far the best team race this year. We were really united," he said. "I was really pleased with my race, and it was a really good job by the fellows. But there are better things to come."

The women's team was also excited about its second place, which means automatic qualification for nationals. The Cats, with 83 points, trailed Nebraska by 17 points, but third-place Indiana State's 132 points didn't threaten the harriers.

"The women didn't have a great day, but in this meet you just want to qualify," Capriotti said.

Strong 1st half propels Chiefs

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — At least Dave Krieg was half good.

The Kansas City quarterback emerged from a two-game slump with 232 passing yards in the first half Sunday, then returned to mediocrity with a 70-yard second half in a 35-16 victory over Washington.

"That first half was about as good as anybody could ask for," said Krieg, who was 19 for 29, for 302 yards and two touchdowns, both to Tim Barnett.

"You can't do everything perfect. Football's not an exact science. I think we kind of relaxed in the second half."

The Chiefs scored on their first four possessions and went into halftime with a 28-0 lead. But the Redskins came back in the second half to set up three Chip Lohmiller field goals and Ricky Ervins' 5-yard touchdown run, cutting the lead to 28-16 with 13:30 left.

Then Barnett, who had six catches for 148 yards, beat A.J. Johnson on a 35-yard touchdown pass that ended the Redskins' first regular-season appearance in Arrowhead Stadium.

"They're as talented as any group we've played," Washington quarterback Mark Rypien said.

Krieg's 232 yards in the first half exceeded his combined total for the two previous games, when he had four interceptions and no touchdowns.

"Obviously, our team came to play today," Chiefs coach Marty Schottenheimer said. "I thought David played very, very well."

Harvey Williams, who has been slowed all year by various injuries, rushed 19 times for 88 yards and picked up the offense when Krieg's passing touch deserted him in the third quarter.

Both teams are now 6-4. "It feels really good to have 78,000 people screaming your name," Williams said.

Krieg led an 11-play, 60-yard drive in the first quarter. He unloaded a 44-yard scoring pass to Barnett on the first play following Charles Mincy's interception of Rypien.

Krieg hit J.J. Birden for 9 yards and Fred Jones for 14 in an 11-play, 83-yard drive midway through the second quarter to set up a 3-yard scoring burst by Okoye and a 21-0 lead.

On their next possession, Krieg found Barnett for 12- and 39-yard gains in a 13-play, 88-yard march. With 37 seconds left in the half, Williams went five yards up the middle for a 28-0 lead over the defending Super Bowl champions.

"It's very frustrating for all of us," Rypien said.

CHIEFS ROUNDUP

- Quarterback Dave Krieg threw for 302 yards, 232 in the first half alone.
- Wide receiver Tim Barnett caught six passes, good for 148 yards and two touchdowns.
- Running back Harvey Williams gained 88 yards rushing, his best performance of the season.

Chiefs-Redskins game marked by protesters

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — With police and guards protecting them, about 100 American Indians and supporters protested outside Arrowhead Stadium on Sunday against sports teams' use of Indian nicknames and artifacts.

But their suggestions went largely ignored by Kansas City Chiefs fans, who performed the "tomahawk chop" and sang a war chant on the Chiefs' first scoring drive against the Washington Redskins.

In their four-hour demonstration before the game, the protesters said use of nicknames like the "Redskins" and the "Chiefs" perpetuates negative and racist stereotypes of Indians.

"We're saying: 'Play football and stop playing Indians,'" said Vernon Bellecourt, a co-founder of the American Indian Movement. "Stop this demeaning, degrading and despicable exploitation of our cultural and spiritual life."

The protest drew an angry response from at least an equal number of Chiefs fans, who objected loudly to an American flag held upside down in the middle of the gathering.

"It's ridiculous," said Dustin Snow, 18, a season-ticket holder from suburban Overland Park. "Why do they have that flag upside down? They talk about racism. Well, putting the flag upside down is against all Americans, and it's a disgrace."

George Robertson, 47, of Kansas City, held one corner of the 4-foot-long flag. He said the display signified a nation in distress.

"When people have that kind of contempt for the major minority in this country, that's distress," Robertson said. "It makes me sick."

The demonstrators were guarded by more than 12 police officers, several Indian security guards and seven officials from the U.S. Department of Justice.

Some fans who ringed the parking-lot protest said they sympathized with the Indians' arguments, but most said they did not see why the name "Chiefs" should be changed. Many also said that protesting a Kansas City game was not the right way to air concerns about racism in the Indian community.

"Nobody dresses up for these games out of disrespect for Indians," Jerry Wilson, of nearby Raytown, Mo., said. "I think they need to take this in the spirit intended."

A Chiefs official declined to comment on the protest.

Several speakers at the demonstration stressed that they held no animosity toward football or football fans.

But they said they were angered and saddened by the war chants and chops with which some fans taunted them.

K-State's tennis team was in action November 11-14 in Omaha, Neb., at the I.T.A. Rolex Championships.

After a first-round bye, Susana Labrador went on Wednesday to win her second-round match against Tiffany George of Oklahoma, 6-1, 6-2. Thursday Labrador lost to Kim Rogers of Kansas by default.

Suzanne Sim defeated Boise State's Bindi Thomas 6-2, 5-7, 6-3, before losing to Ann Flannery of Nebraska 6-1, 4-6, 6-3.

Freshman Maria Uson was defeated by Susie Eniga of Webster State 6-1, 6-1. Uson also lost in the consolation to Northern Arizona's Pasahides 6-4, 5-7, 7-5.

Sophomore Martine Shrubsole was defeated in the first round by Karen McIntosh of Colorado 6-1, 6-2. Shrubsole won her first match in the consolation round and her second match against Frauke Hachtmann of Nebraska, 6-1, 6-0, Thursday. In the semifinals Friday she lost to Colorado's Renee Marshall 6-0, 6-0.

► OILERS' QB MOON FRACTURES ARM

MINNEAPOLIS (AP) —

Houston Oilers quarterback Warren Moon fractured his upper left arm Sunday and is expected to miss three to six weeks.

He is scheduled to have tests Monday, at which time a more complete diagnosis will be made.

Moon was hurt at the end of a 5-yard scramble that set up Houston's winning touchdown in a 17-13 victory over the Minnesota Vikings.

He eluded linemen John Randle and Chris Doleman in the backfield and Jack Del Rio in the open field before diving for the first down. On the dive, Vencie Glenn hit Moon, causing the injury.

The run for Moon set up the winning touchdown for Houston.

"He knew the game was on the line," Oiler offensive tackle Don Maggs said. "He knew we needed the first down, and he did what he had to for the good of the team."

"That's the mark of a true leader."

Moon, one of the most prolific passers in NFL history, completed 28 of 38 passes for 243 yards before the injury.

► PETTY'S LAST RACE ENDS IN EARLY CRASH

HAMPTON, Ga. (AP) — No king has abdicated his throne before a more adoring audience or in a more appreciative realm.

Cheers were shouted to the sunny blue skies, tears were shed, awards were given, tributes were spoken and sung as Richard Petty, the beloved king of stock car racing, got out of his Pontiac for the last time and ambled gracefully into retirement.

Petty ended his year-long, self-styled Fan Appreciation Tour on Sunday in a circus-like atmosphere filled with hoopla and throngs of well-wishers, fans and media at Atlanta Motor Speedway.

His last time behind the wheel of a 600-horsepower race car was eventful.

He led a pace lap, lost a lap to the leaders early, was involved in a crash that all but ended his race day, then came back for a unique curtain call, driving onto the 1.522-mile oval in his battered Pontiac one lap from the end of the race to take his final checkered flag.

Jardine updates child care staff

Members discuss new issues, ideas at many conferences

SHEDERA BAUSCH

Education is an on-going process at KSU Child Development Center. Staff members of the center have been attending conferences to help spread new ideas and information to others working in the child-care field.

Jana Adams, director of the center, and 11 other center staff members went to the Kansas Association for the Education of Young Children conference Oct. 10 at Emporia State University.

"The staff is required to participate in 10 hours of in-service each year," Adams said. "Those hours can be completed through conferences and workshops."

LuAnn Hoover, assistant director of the early childhood lab, also attended the KAYC conference.

"It's a good experience," Hoover said. "Conferences lift your spirits and keep you up to date with what is going on in your field."

Hoover said the conferences provide a variety of presentations through keynote speakers and several workshops.

"Some of the workshops are aimed at preschool teachers, grade-school teachers, administration and other people in the child-care profession," Hoover said.

Speakers are addressing some new issues, such as children's rights and salary upgrades to compensate for teachers, she said.

"There are several workshops, so you may choose three, depending on your different level of need," Hoover said.

Adams and other staff members went to a food service program sponsored by the U.S. Department of Agriculture at the Holiday Inn Holidome in Manhattan.

Adams said this conference gave teachers and child-care workers some food-service ideas for snacks, food preparation and techniques for cooking with young children.

Adams and other child-care center administrators attended an administrative conference Oct. 23.

"This conference took a look at issues that affect administrators of institutions, such as hiring, firing, staffing events and boosting employee spirit," Adams said.

Adams said she and staff members are able to bring back information from the conferences and share it with the employees and board members of the child-care corporation.

Duarte resets rarely seen jazz scene

MEGANNE MOORE
Collegian

Aggieville had something last Thursday night that may not quickly return.

The Chris Duarte Group.

The trio, fronted by guitarist Chris Duarte, rocked an enthusiastic crowd at Snookie's Bar.

Duarte has the unique guitar ability that a true rhythm and blues fan can identify with.

He covered all mixes of the guitar into his set with jazz, fusion, soul and blues.

The setting resembled the classic jazz scene, with a smoke-filled bar and people of all ages gathered eagerly listening to good tunes.

Needless to say, this is not as common an occurrence in Manhattan as it should or could be.

Duarte's physically resembled the lead singer of Extreme, but his music surpasses his looks.

By the middle of the three-hour-plus set, Duarte was perspiring and his emotion could be seen dripping from his guitar strings.

Duarte's adrenaline could be sensed by the crowd of more than 100 as it drenched the bar.

Adding to the sizzling set were bassist Jeff Hodges and drummer Paul Mills.

Although he's billed as such, Duarte cannot be categorized as the "next Stevie Ray," because he's unique in his own sound.

He has the ability to draw his audience in, not only to feel his music, but become a part of it.

"He'll be someone you can tell your kids about someday," said Mitch Ulrich, owner of Vital Vinyl, who booked the show.

Rowing club gets money for season

Erg-a-thon features spectator competition to win CD player

DEBORAH WHITSON
Collegian

There are people who are willing to get sweaty in front of strangers in the middle of a shopping mall in order to win a compact disc player.

Participants in the Erg Challenge did just that Saturday at the Manhattan Town Center.

The Challenge was part of the annual Erg-a-thon, a stationary rowing marathon to raise money for the K-State rowing team's travel and coaching expenses.

"We had a lot of people stop and see what was going on," said Myron Friesen, rowing team president and senior in mechanical engineering and technology. "The main thing with the challenge was to get people involved and interested, and we did."

The Erg-a-thon involved about 80 rowing team members taking 20-minute turns on the stationary rowers, after getting pledges from individuals and businesses. The members were pledged a certain amount per 100 meters, and some were given checks for donations.

"Most of the team rowed about a thousand meters," Friesen said.

"Our goal was a little high last year — $10,000 — but we reached $4,000 then, and we're hoping for $5,000 this year."

He said by 2:30 p.m., there had been about 40 people rowing for time, with the first-place prize being a Technics five-disc compact disc player. Forty-seven men and 17 women participated, and the winner was Wade McReynolds of Fort Riley.

Friesen said that among the people who tried the erg, there was a 6-year-old boy and a 61-year-old man.

"The kid couldn't even sit right on the machine at first," he said. "But once he got on, he finished the whole 1,500 meters."

After the grand prize, the top two times were logged by Troy Schaffer, for the men, and Leslie Brooks, for the women. Both winners live in Manhattan. Friesen said he didn't think any of the winners had ever rowed before.

"The competition wasn't divided by sex to begin with," Friesen said. "The women were given a handicap to make it equal, and after the first prize was awarded, the lesser prizes were given in the women's and men's categories."

Friesen said the main thing to do

Somali refugee ship to get help

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SAN'A, Yemen — A French vessel loaded with emergency supplies of food and water raced Sunday to aid about 3,000 starving Somalis aboard a ship in the Arabian Sea.

The rescue ship was not expected to link up with the refugee-laden cargo vessel, headed to Yemen, until Monday.

Sources in Yemen, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said they feared as many as 100 children may already have died of starvation or thirst.

Meanwhile, in the Somali capital, Mogadishu, a clan leader continued to demand that U.N. troops withdraw from the international airport, which they began guarding Tuesday to protect planes carrying relief food and medicine.

About 1,000 supporters of Gen. Mohammed Farah Aidid, the clan warlord whose forces control much of southern Mogadishu, marched through the city shouting slogans, such as "We don't want foreign troops."

Unidentified gunmen from another clan opened fire on the demonstration near the airport, but no injuries were reported.

Thousands of Somalis have fled clan fighting and a famine in their country that has killed at least 300,000 people since January. Two million more are said to be on the verge of starvation.

A steady flow of refugees in small boats has headed north to Yemen, where U.N. officials have fed and sheltered them.

Condoms not an acceptable accessory

High-school girl suspended for making statement

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ELMIRA, N.Y. — A high-school junior was removed from school after she went to class with packaged condoms decorating her clothing and hair.

Thursa Hargrove, 16, said she wore the prophylactics as both a statement for safe sex and fashion.

"It was a fashion statement at first, but there are a lot of teenagers out there that are embarrassed about them," said Hargrove, who is the mother of an 18-month-old son.

"People need them and shouldn't be embarrassed by them," she said.

But officials at the Elmira Free Academy, a public school, said she took the message too far.

"When you get a girl or boy sitting in the classroom wearing a condom in their hair, it's distracting to the other students," Principal Joseph Nikiel said.

School officials removed Hargrove from her math class Friday after she refused to remove the dozen individually packaged condoms. She said her 14-year-old sister also wore condoms to school, but she removed them rather than be disciplined.

Hargrove said she was told she could be suspended if she wears the condoms to class today. She said she hadn't decided what to do.

Student reaction was mixed. "I think she had the right to say what she wanted to say. It was a good idea to get the word around about AIDS and sexually transmitted diseases," said Clyde Schuyler, 18, a junior.

"I would say that it's very disruptive," said freshman Anna Bacom, 15. "I don't agree with what she did. I think the school had a right to be angry."

One of Hargrove's supporters is her mother, Katherine Taylor.

"I back my children when they're right, and I don't think it's offensive," she said.

10th with 18:27, just in front of Paulette Staats, 11th, and Cari Warden, 12th.

Martha Pinto finished at 18th, and Jennifer Hillier was back at 39th but still fast enough to give the team its fourth consecutive trip to the nationals.

"The whole group ran solid," Capriotti said. "And that's what it takes to get to the nationals."

"Jennifer had a little bit of an off day, but that was on the last half mile. So, I'm not worried about it for her."

Rugan said the top runners chasing each other pushed the team up front.

"We did really well with our first couple runners," she said.

"At the Big Eight meet, we maybe ran better as a team, but second is great. I'm pretty happy, and everybody else seems to be happy. We'll just make it up at the nationals."

After the women's first-place finish at the conference meet and a runner-up finish in Ames — and vice-versa for the men — Capriotti is optimistic for the NCAA meet.

"I feel good about them. They both are in shape going to the nationals," he said.

when trying an event like this is to pace yourself. He said people get on the machine and kill themselves for the first few minutes, then realize there is still a long way to go.

"We originally started this part of the Erg-a-thon to cover the cost of the rest of the event," he said. "All the mailings and pledge sheets cost a lot of money, and we figured to raise enough with this sideline to cover that. And we did."

The beginning of the event, which was scheduled for Nov. 11, was rained out, Friesen said. The crew did its stints at the boathouse, with the culmination of the event on Saturday.

Friesen said the crew would like to expand the challenge in the future with a faculty challenge and participation of businesses.

Stacey Nodolf, sophomore in art, said the erg requires more strength and stamina than actual skill.

"Keeping that skinny boat going in the right direction is a skill learned in the water," she said.

Besides the CD player, the crew gave away tapes and CDs, T-shirts and gift certificates.

Republican reflects on race job and gave Slattery 56 percent of the vote.

Van Slyke received 41 percent, with the remaining 3 percent going to Libertarian Arthur Clack.

In fact, for all of the noise made about reform and the need for new voices in Congress, only 10 incumbents were defeated nationwide.

Van Slyke said he thinks he knows why.

"The incumbents have, on average, 11 times the amount of money; they have access to free mail service; they receive congressional staff assistance; and they have a paid campaign staff," he said.

Van Slyke said he spent about $35,000 on his campaign, whereas Slattery spent between $500,000 and $700,000.

"If I had $50,000 to $100,000 more, I could have won," he said.

He also believes state congressional redistricting had an effect on his failed campaign.

Incumbents did not announce which district seat they would run for until redistricting was finalized. This, in turn, inhibited challengers from throwing their hats in the ring early, Van Slyke said.

"I could have entered the race earlier, but until the redistricting was completed, it was not practical," he said.

New districts were drawn by May, putting time constraints on challengers.

"It was tough to put together an effective campaign in only five months," Van Slyke said. "I would liked to have spent more time fundraising, but that would have taken away from meeting the public."

Politics aside, Van Slyke said he commends Slattery on his successful campaign.

"He ran a clean, well-run, hard-fought campaign," Van Slyke said. "I have to give him credit for getting out and working in the district."

However, Van Slyke did find fault with one area of Slattery's campaign.

"He had his television and radio ads produced out of state, and he saturated the air waves three to four weeks before the election. He overdid it," Van Slyke said. "He spent money that was not necessary for the final outcome."

Van Slyke said he is proud his campaign didn't put him in debt. Before he entered the race, he said, he and his wife sat down and concluded they should not overspend themselves.

That, Van Slyke believes, shows what kind of congressman he would have been.

"You need to demonstrate responsibility with money in your campaign. If you overspend with your campaign money, what do you think you would do in Washington?"

For now, Van Slyke said he is uncertain of his future political plans.

"I would like to serve in Congress someday. For now, I will sit back and let others take the reins," he said.

But sitting back doesn't mean he's not going to keep a critical eye on Washington.

"They (the Democrats) have the responsibility, and it could be a little dangerous. They have complete control," he said.

"If they fix the health-care system, they deserve all the credit, but if they don't, they have to take the blame. In two years, there may be some changes if there aren't any productive effects."

Alumni return to rodeo in Weber

"The alumni rodeo has been around about as long as the college rodeo has," she said.

Steve Cutshaw, senior in animal science and industry and past rodeo team member, competed in the team roping event. He said many people consider rodeos a hobby.

But for Cutshaw and others like him, it is a year-round way of life.

"I've rodeoed hard all my life," he said. "Some people just don't understand what it's all about."

Cutshaw said putting on a good rodeo takes more than a love for the sport. It takes a lot of experience, a good understanding of the people who rodeo and the ethical do's and don'ts, he said.

Rodeo Club member Destry Lynn, junior in agriculture education, said he plans to come back to the alumni rodeos after he graduates.

"A lot of the alumni are here to see how the program is doing and to show support for the school," he said.

Stevens said the Rodeo Club is not likely to make any money off the rodeo since fees were paid back like any other rodeo and also helped to cover stock charge.

"We have already done really well, but we need to harvest what we have planted. This is difficult to do without funding."

DENNIS LAW

"We are one of the finest programs in the country, and at the same time, we have the lowest salaries in the Big Eight and even amongst the other colleges here," he said. "This isn't right."

"The college would like to emphasize its international programs. We have already done really well, but we need to harvest what we have planted," Law said.

"This is difficult to do without funding."

Since the Department of Interior Design offers only a bachelor's degree, Law said, it would like to emphasize sponsored faculty research and urban programs.

The college would also like to focus on the Department of Architecture's graduate degrees, faculty research and urban programs.

Some of the funding for these areas will come from reduced funding levels in the dean's office.

"The former dean really built a staff and let our teaching and educational services have a loss to the administration level," Law said.

"We think we can considerably cut down costs in the office and take those funds to the heart of education."

Law said all of the aspirations and changes being proposed are important to the college, but the degree to which they will grow will vary.

"I really don't think we will actually see the pennies from the Legislature after the Role and Aspirations process," Law said.

"It has been an extremely time-consuming, costly and demoralizing process. It has cost the taxpayers millions of dollars statewide, and I am not convinced it was worth it."

"The college has cut as much as they can," Law said. "We can not cut anymore."

Being a Marine Corps Officer can open the door to opportunities you may have thought were beyond your reach. It helped Marine Officer Charles Bolden become a NASA astronaut. And if you're willing to make the commitment, it could help you also. You can get started while you're in college with our undergraduate officer commissioning program. You could take advantage of getting:

- $100 a month while in school
- Freshmen and Sophomores train during two six-week summer sessions

- each paying more than $1,300
- Juniors train in one ten-week summer session and earn more than $2,200
- Free civilian flying lessons
- A starting salary of more than $22,000

Immediately upon graduation you could become a Marine Officer. It's your choice. Maybe you're the kind of man we're looking for.

The Few. The Proud. The Marines.

We want you to go as far as you can.

Teacher offends student with biased views on abortion

DEAR CASSANDRA,

First of all I would like to congratulate you on your truly interesting column. You are definitely straight forward and to the point.

I am writing you to tell you of an unfortunate incident that occurred in one of my classes. I used to admire the teacher and enjoy his class, but he went too far when he voiced his very biased opinion on abortion. He talked as though abortion was a woman's choice and that, in other words, us pro-lifers can go to hell.

I am pro-life, but I would never try to persuade someone by preaching my own beliefs. It is my right, as it is his right, to believe what I want. Abortion is a very touchy subject and also very controversial. I don't appreciate professionals, such as teachers, trying to place their beliefs on students. I felt totally alone in a class of students who were going right along with him.

I only hope that this letter will encourage teachers to keep their biased opinions out of class. Either defend both sides or no side at all. Thank you for your time.

Concerned and Very Upset

DEAR CONCERNED,

While I disagree with your stance on abortion, I do believe a University should encourage an environment that promotes the exchange of ideas, and that you have not really received a college education if you have not, at some point, found your established beliefs challenged. I have found that most of the instructors at K-State try to do this.

I believe the instructor's most important duty is to present the student with as much credible information on a given subject as is humanly possible. This does not mean that he/she should be limited to only presenting the facts.

Opinions and interpretations are very useful tools for stimulating discussion and generating thought-provoking questions. I think, rather than eliminating opinions from the classroom, your instructor should have appropriately identified his statements as opinion, and then given equal time for any dissenting opinion(s).

DEAR CASSANDRA,

I am writing this letter because I am concerned about a recent decision of mine. I have been living with a girl for more than a year and we have dated for longer than that.

She has wanted to get married for quite some time but I am not sure I am ready to make that big of a step in my life. I feel that I really do love her and that sometime down the road we will get married. However, she feels we should get married now.

My problem is that a few weeks ago I was out with the fellows and drank rather heavily. I called my girlfriend to tell her I would be staying at a friend's house because I did not feel I was able to drive home. While we were talking she asked me if I would marry her and I agreed. However, at the time, I was drunk and thought she was just kidding.

The next morning when I got home she was ecstatic and already planning the wedding. I knew then I had made a big mistake and told her I was just kidding and didn't think that she was serious about proposing. She was crestfallen and began to cry. I felt terrible and did the only thing I could think of to make her feel better. I told her I really would marry her.

Now, I think that maybe I should have stood my ground and waited until I am ready because she is constantly asking me where I am going and basically trying to run my life. I guess what I am trying to say is that I am definitely not ready to get married now and maybe not ever. So, Cassandra, how do I tell my girlfriend?

DEAR J.T.W.,

Whether she understands or not, you do your girlfriend no favors by following through with a promise made while intoxicated, followed by a second promise made under duress. What is obvious here is a complete failure to accurately communicate.

So, start by doing some accurate communicating now. Tell her, that after having thought things over with a clear head, you have reconsidered the idea of marriage. Explain that you are truly not ready for marriage (your vacillation being one obvious indication), and that this is not the way to start a marriage. Tell her you care enough about her to tell her this now, before getting married, rather than after the fact. And last but not least, say you're sorry. Who knows, she just might understand.

However, I feel anyone that would propose marriage to a drunk and then accept that person's inebriated response as being rational, needs to have their head examined.

Letters to Cassandra may be submitted in person or by mail to the Kansas State Collegian, c/o Cassandra Duveaux, Kedzie Hall 106, Manhattan, KS 66506.

Injury accident

Riley County paramedics attempt to move Pelisha Branch of Ogden from her car after a one-car accident shortly after 5:30 p.m. Monday night on a Seth Childs Road bridge. Branch was traveling with her son, Richard, south on Seth Childs when she swerved to avoid hitting a bag of leaves. Pelisha Branch avoided the bag of leaves, but her car rammed into the bridge railing, crossed lanes and came to rest at the opposite railing. Pelisha Branch complained of back pain and was taken to Memorial Hospital, where she was treated and dismissed. Richard Branch was not injured. Traffic was backed up for more than 30 minutes on Highway K-113.

Clinton pledges to end D.C. gridlock

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. — President-elect Clinton emerged from his first post-election meeting with Democratic leaders of Congress with a promise to move quickly on his domestic agenda and the legislative gridlock in Washington.

House and Senate leaders spent more than three hours with Clinton at the Arkansas governor's mansion Sunday night, discussing a range of issues where Clinton needs congressional action to make good on his promises.

Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell of Maine said the meeting was informative, helpful and centered around plans and hopes for the new year and a new beginning.

"I think that everybody's ready to move forward on the same priorities," George Stephanopoulos, Clinton's chief spokesman, said. "The details are always going to be worked out, but I think we have a general strong commitment to move forward on those priorities."

"I think tonight the leaders and the president got together and cemented their relationship and are ready to work together," he said.

"People want an end to gridlock in Washington and want Washington to work for them. What we see tonight is a commitment from both sides to make that happen."

It was, he said, "a powerful signal to the American people."

Before the meeting, Clinton said, "We've got a big job to do, and we've got to do it together."

Clinton is almost certain to get strong congressional cooperation for his top priority, an economic stimulus package that includes tax breaks for new investment. Congress passed similar legislation last year, only to see it vetoed by President Bush because it also included a tax increase on the wealthy to offset the costs.

Health care, ethics law reform, and a higher education spending program also are high on Clinton's list. But those initiatives may wait well beyond Clinton's promised initial 100-day legislative thrust.

"I think tonight the leaders and the president got together and cemented their relationship and are ready to work together."

Officers face murder charges

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DETROIT — Two white policemen were charged with murder Monday in the Nov. 5 beating of a black motorist that heightened tensions with its echoes of the Rodney King case. Two other officers were charged with lesser offenses.

Officers Larry Nevers and Walter Budzyn could get life in prison if convicted of second-degree murder in the death of 35-year-old Malice Green. Green died of head

Raborn says no regrets in campaign

Politics still possible for former student

DEBORAH WHITSON
Collegian

EDITOR'S NOTE: This is the second in a four-part series taking a look at the campaigns and plans of area candidates who did not win their races Nov. 3.

Political candidates enter into the race with high hopes and ideals.

When they're not elected, all the money, time and energy expended could seem like a waste.

But Democrat Craig Raborn, losing candidate for Riley County Clerk's office, has good feelings about his participation in the '92 election.

"It was an overall good experience," he said. "I think as a challenger, that if I got even that many people to vote for me, I did well."

Raborn

Raborn said he learned a lot from his campaign, and he had no regrets about entering the race. Raborn took 41 percent of the vote in his race.

Raborn has been selected by the Riley County Democratic Committee as a delegate to the Democratic District Convention in a few weeks. That might not have happened if he had not been in the spotlight two weeks ago.

However, his future plans as a candidate are undecided.

"I think I'm through being a candidate for a few years," he said. "I guess the answer to the question of whether I will participate in another election is yes, but I'm not comfortable discussing that yet."

Raborn interned in the Kansas legislature last spring and ran for Manhattan City Commission previously, so he has other experience in the political arena. He said he will be using that experience to help run some campaigns for fellow Democrats.

"I think it would be a shame not to tell people about what I've learned," he said.

Ag proposes degree cuts

EDITOR'S NOTE: The Kansas Board of Regents has called for new Role and Aspirations Statements from each state university. This the second story in a look at what each college at K-State is doing to fulfill this mandate.

Several agriculture degrees will be eliminated, and 10 programs will be emphasized. Those changes are proposed in the College of Agriculture's Role and Aspirations report.

Dean of agriculture Marc Johnson said the degrees would be eliminated because of low enrollment.

"It's like with every product on the shelf. Those products that are not bought are removed, and others emphasized," Johnson said.

There are 13 students enrolled in the pest science and management, 14 in associated degree of retail floriculture, 12 in pre-forestry program and two in the master's program of agriculture technology management.

These changes will allow these students to finish their programs, however, no new students will be allowed to enroll.

Todd Nightingale, freshman in pre-forestry, said a lot of his plans are up in the air, but he thinks the pre-forestry program at

NEWS DIGEST

► OFFICER SHOTS TRANSFER PRISONER

KANSAS CITY (AP) — A prisoner being transferred from the city jail to the Wyandotte County Jail was shot and killed after he grabbed the officer's nightstick and struck him, police said.

The officer fired at least once and struck the prisoner. The officer was treated at a hospital for head lacerations.

The unidentified man had been arrested earlier for burglary and auto theft.

► KOREAN WAR VETS REMEMBERED

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Ground-breaking ceremonies were held Sunday in San Pedro for a monument honoring Korean War veterans. The $4-million memorial will be a life-size bronze sculpture of 11 soldiers and a field nurse to honor soldiers who fought against the North Korean and Chinese.

About 580,000 U.N. and South Korean troops and 1.6 million Communist troops were killed.

Bishops meet with groups

Talks allow church to hear from victims of sexual abuse

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Roman Catholic bishops, braced for a week of controversy on the role of women in the church, tended to other troubling church issues on Monday — homosexuals and victims of sexual abuse by priests.

Representatives of both groups had demonstrated outside, but in a rare departure from custom, the groups were welcomed inside to a hotel meeting room for conciliatory talks with some bishops.

"It was one of the most moving experiences I ever had," said Cardinal Roger Mahony of Los Angeles after an hour's session with victims of sexual abuse.

"They've been deeply wounded by the conduct of some of our priests," he later told the full bishops' meeting. "Their faith has been shattered and in some cases, totally lost."

He said they wanted the bishops to "show loving concern and healing" for them and "not legalist protecting of erring priests."

Mahony, along with Bishops Alexander Quinn of Cleveland and Harry Flynn of Lafayette, La., said the church must help abuse victims.

"You and I know many victims of sexual misconduct across the land," Mahony said. "People are looking for accountability. We have much to learn from those who are hurting and aggrieved."

Apologizing to the victims' group for past failings, he said, "Across the land, it is clear that we lack evenness in the way dioceses deal with the problem. Our approach must be a full response of every segment of the church."

The protesting organizations, including Survivors Network of Abuse by Priests and Victims of Clergy Abuse Linkup, said they represented a total of about 4,000 individuals abused as youngsters.

In another unusual side meeting, Bishop James Malone of Youngstown, Ohio, met with leaders of Dignity, an organization of Catholic homosexuals, and New Ways Ministries, which carries on ministry among gays and lesbians.

They also had demonstrated outside the Omni Shoreham Hotel, carrying placards saying "Catholic Lesbians and Gays Losing Civil Rights."

Malone, noting he was acting at the request of the bishops' president, Archbishop Daniel Pilarczyk of Cincinnati, told the group he recognized the "pain and hurt" many have experienced over a recent Vatican document.

It said discrimination against them was justified in certain specified fields, such as teaching, as adoptive parents, coaching and the military.

He pointed out bishops have often "condemned violence, hatred and bigotry against any person and will continue to do so."

STATE

Tax blamed for secession

ANDY WOODWARD
Collegian

A levy tax initiated by Gov. Joan Finney is the reason for the western Kansas secession movement, Don Concannon, Hugoton lawyer, said.

Concannon, leader of the western Kansas secession movement, spoke at the K-State Union Monday afternoon as part of the Rural Initiatives' Rural Issues Luncheon.

He described how and why the movement started, and where it's headed.

"She started this whole thing by starting the 45 mill levy throughout the state," Concannon said. "The only people who got windfalls from that were the urban areas."

Concannon said grassroots efforts to break away began last January when he wrote letters expressing his desire to secede to the Associated Press, county commissions and legislators.

A petition drive had been organized by late February, he said. At latest count, nine counties have expressed dissatisfaction and an interest in seceding from the state.

In his speech, he compared Sedgwick and Stevens counties on the basis of population, taxation levels and income levels.

Concannon said his figures show people in Wichita and the surrounding area have 90 times the collective income of residents of Stevens County. Yet, people in Sedgwick county only pay seven times more per capita in real-estate tax and 11 times more in property tax than residents of Stevens County.

To accentuate the differences in the school systems, Concannon cited that, in addition to a core language curriculum, Russian, Japanese and Arabic were being taught in Shawnee Mission. Only a few sections of French, German and Spanish are taught in Stevens County.

"They're not teaching western Kansas children the same things they're teaching in Wichita and Shawnee Mission," Concannon said.

Concannon's concerns about the educational system were at the forefront of his presentation.

"Kansas has been good to me, and it will be good to my kids. Anyone who graduated from Troy, Sabetha, Moscow, or Shawnee Mission should be able to walk into a classroom and compete," he said.

Concannon said he had no kind words for corporate and special interests in the Kansas government.

"I'll pick on Koch Industries. Koch Industries is worth over 4 billion dollars. Eighty percent of that is in stock owned by the family, and they don't pay one penny towards the education of Kansas children. To me, that isn't fair," he said.

Ideological virtue and regional support is what keeps him going, Concannon said.

"Our wealth in western Kansas is being selectively taxed," he said. "There hasn't been a single constitutional lawyer to say to me 'You can't do this. You can't secede.'"

"We get a 20-1 vote that says 'Let us secede,' yet, no one wants to let us proceed," Concannon said.

"I was in World War II. I wouldn't leave this country," he said. "It's that the state of Kansas has forgotten the reason we fought in World War II — equality."

Car, tractor collide on K-18

DAVID MAYES/Collegian

Debbie Smith, Clay Center, is taken by Riley County emergency personnel to an ambulance after she and her husband, William, were involved in an accident with a tractor Monday afternoon on Highway K-18 north of Ogden. Debbie Smith was taken to a local hospital for evaluation.

Lane change leads to wreck north of Ogden

AMY COX
Collegian

A minor-injury accident involving a car and a tractor occurred Monday afternoon on Highway 18 just north of Ogden.

William Smith, Clay Center, was headed eastbound in a 1988 Chevrolet Cavalier with his wife, Debbie, when he attempted to pass the vehicle in front of him and hit a slow-moving tractor ahead of him in the left lane.

Debbie Smith sustained a possible broken kneecap and hit her head on the windshield when the car was thrown into the left-side guardrail, Riley County Police Officer Jeffrey Hooper said.

She was transported by Riley County EMS to a local hospital for further evaluation. She and her husband were wearing seat belts.

William Smith was uninjured and cited for an unsafe lane change. Hooper said, Smith told him he did not see the 1991 John Deere 4055 tractor until he pulled into the left lane to pass, and it was too late.

Galen Grossnickle, Ogden, was driving the tractor.

"The tractor cab is so loud, all I heard was a little thud," he said. "I didn't know anyone had hit me until that soldier flagged me down."

A Fort Riley soldier, driver of the vehicle William Smith was trying to pass, flagged down Grossnickle, who had continued driving down the highway.

Grossnickle and the tractor were uninjured except for a small dent in the red, slow-moving vehicle emblem such tractors are required to have.

Grossnickle's wife, Josephine, was also a witness to the accident. It occurred about a quarter mile from the Grossnickle residence.

"I looked out the window, and I just knew something was wrong. I just got in my car and drove down here. I'm surprised I made it down here all right," she said.

Galen Grossnickle was driving the tractor for Bill Kauer, owner of the tractor and a farm in Ogden.

LOU DOUGLAS LECTURE

Durning: 'How much is enough?'

JANET SATTERLEE
Collegian

Alan Thein Durning, senior researcher at Worldwatch Institute, spoke about consumers and the future of the Earth Monday night in the K-State Union Forum Hall.

Durning's speech was the fifth and final Lou Douglas Lecture of the semester.

"We need things consumed, burned up, worn out, replaced and discarded at an ever increasing rate," he said.

He said if environmental degradation results, we have to decide "how much is enough" and consider future population rates, which will eventually reach ten billion people worldwide.

Designing a post-consumer society with comforts for everyone is the goal, Durning said.

"It's a call on our creativity to blend the old with the new and to find ways to provide ourselves comforts with a creative and vibrant unity of society..."

He said there are several ways to tame the philosophy of consumption and lower the per capita consumption of resources.

First, tax and subsidy policies must be changed.

For example, Durning suggested placing taxes on pollution resulting from natural gases, oil and carbon to decrease consumption of natural resources.

Secondly, Durning said by increasing leisure time, people will reduce consumption of convenience goods and decrease the availability of new purchasing power.

Durning said we must also come up with ways within the rights of freedom of speech to "curtail the reign of advertising."

The final element that contributes to higher consumption is shopping malls which replace downtowns, Durning said.

"We not only ensure that urban sprawl lives on and the natural resources are wasted."

"But we also condone the erosion of a sense of community that our traditional downtowns, that our civic centers have provided for us in the past."

Durning said reducing consumption is a long-term challenge.

"In the end, it involves profound changes in our personal and social values," he said.

U.S. workers on top of world

THE ISSUE

American workers have been criticized as being lazy and unable to keep the United States competitive.

WE SUGGEST

A new study has shown that output per U.S. worker is higher than those of Japan, Great Britain and West Germany.

The arrival of Bill Clinton into the Oval Office arouses many hopes. Among these includes the hope that he will find a way to dispel the idea that American workers are lazy.

And now he has a study to back it up.

The McKinsey Global Institute has revealed that American workers are more productive than workers in France, Germany and Japan.

In 1990, the average U.S. worker produced $49,600 in goods and services, as compared with $44,200 for West German workers, and down from there for workers in Japan and Great Britain.

It seems the bashing of the American laborer may be unfounded.

In his presidential election campaign, Ross Perot cried out that the quality of the working class continued to produce in the face of heavy criticism from the management of big corporations.

Perot contended the woes of American industry were caused by an inept profit-hungry managerial system.

And now, the fault is falling on those same managers who took multimillion-dollar salaries and drove their businesses into bankruptcy.

This callous attitude toward business allowed many businessmen to walk away with millions, while putting millions of workers out of jobs.

Enough, already. The American work ethic is alive and well. We have the determination and the production to back our words up.

The world economy is not a static entity. It's a dynamic organism that is always in flux. It would behoove other countries to remember that although American industry is in a slump, it is hardly a shell.

Bill Clinton has a long road to hoe. Let's hope he finds the energy and determination so inherent in the American worker to silence the foreign critics for good.

GOODBYE

K-State experience is one good memory

Editor,

On May 4, 1987, Reba Snively offered me the opportunity to work with some of the most dedicated hard-working people I know. On Nov. 20, I will be leaving my position as manager of Central Mail Services to assume new administrative duties off campus.

Words cannot express the admiration I feel for being given the chance to serve this wonderful University. The cooperation received from each department, as well as the dedicated performance of my staff, resulted in a service of which we are certainly proud.

I will cherish the memories of the past five and a half years and will miss working with all of you.

FEMINISTS

Column shows the true submissive light

Editor,

I want to thank John Hart for his insightful column "Feminists directly responsible for the family downfall."

After reading the column, I saw the grave error of my feminist ways and since decided to no longer deny my true submissiveness. As a result, I am now actively seeking a husband to whom I can submit.

By the way, John, are you available? I feel you would be one supremely "worthy of being followed."

MORE FEMINISM

Marriage is a union, not a slave contract

Editor,

It has been a long time since I have read a sexist, bigoted piece of garbage like John Hart's Monday column.

Hart claims a woman should be submissive to her husband. He further claims that "submissiveness is neither sexist or demeaning," yet goes on to say that "America teaches us that power, control and leadership will make you a successful person." Is he trying to say that a woman should not be a successful person? He also says that submissiveness is "about giving, sacrifice and selflessness." Yet Hart tries to tell us that the wife alone should exhibit these qualities and not the husband. According to Hart, the idea of a marriage as an equal partnership in which one partner gives some to the other is "radical thinking."

It may come as a shock to Hart that some men, probably most men, do not want a servant for a wife. I personally would like a wife with whom I can share my thoughts and opinions and who will share hers with me, even if they disagree with. I am sure there are some men and women who disagree with my opinion, and that is fine. I just hope they find each other. The high divorce rate in this country comes from a misunderstanding of the roles expected of each partner, not from "feminist thinking."

If both members made sure they agreed on these roles before entering into the marriage, we would have more "healthy and functional marriages and families."

JUST GUYS

Confusion abounds over group's purpose

Editor,

Many of us are confused by just what it is "Just Guys" is trying to accomplish.

For those of you who don't know, "Just Guys" is a discussion group of pro-feminist men who believe that if males treated themselves in the same way they treat women, we would either be "at peace or dead." (This quote was taken from the most recent "Just Guys" sign.)

"Just Guys" does not allow women to attend their meetings. This brings me to the problem. If equal treatment of women is a belief — not just a slogan — then ending sexism seems to be the ultimate goal.

If the goal of "Just Guys" is ending sexism, then will that happen without women being present?

The driving force behind sexism is fear. Men keep women — and sometimes women keep men — down because we are afraid of what might happen when we release power.

How will we ever put ignorance behind us if we continue to isolate ourselves? If ending sexism is the goal, then women must be present. I believe both sexes don't realize half the problems until we get together.

As I said before, and others are confused as to which goal this group is attempting to reach. I don't just see this confusion in the general populace, but I see the results of this confusion in the meeting of the group itself. (I'm a member.)

Taylor Mali, I believe K-State and men desperately need this group. When this confusion is cleared up, I think the group will finally have a shot at realizing its potential.

FEMINISM AGAIN

Few men worthy of columnist's ideas

Editor,

During World War II, women were encouraged and needed in the work force. When the soldiers came home, the women were told to go home and just take care of family matters. But for many, new independence from the socially imposed submission was intolerable.

During the late 1950s and 1960s, the attitude was for the man to find himself, to discover his own identity. Many left their families to follow their own selfish impulses, leaving wives at home with no way to make a living, yet with dependents of their own.

In this modern era, I know of few men worthy of the submission John feels men deserve. I personally do not care to get a venereal disease or AIDS because I played the good wife and stuck by my husband. I don't care to have my self-esteem ground into the dirt so that he can maintain his self-image at my expense.

I agree that women are more "submissive." But this is so they can deal with the physical and emotional demands of dependent children, not for men who depend on a woman's submission for their independence.

Submission requires one to be beneath another. A real relationship exists between equals, and a "real man" is not threatened by a woman's ability to stand on her own.

TOLES

Empty chants carry pro-choice view

Why would you advise someone to pray to a defeated deity?

A clash between pro-choice and pro-life turns into inane yelling

On Nov. 7, pro-choice militants rallied their forces to the Albany Family Clinic in the windy city of Chicago in hopes of deterring pro-life activists slated to demonstrate at the clinic.

The choice coalition began its counter demonstration of the already entrenched life protest by shouting clever chants such as, "Pray. You'll need it. Your God has been defeated!" and "Racist, sexist, anti-gay, born-again bigots go away!"

The first chant strikes me as peculiar.

Why would you advise someone to pray to a defeated deity? If in fact, this deity is defeated, why would anyone pray to him?

Why encourage another to pray to such a god? Just about anyone in his right mind can see the inconsistency of such a silly chant.

Besides, what do the Catholics for Choice, or other religious segments of the choice platform, think of such a statement?

It would appear from this flagrant disdain for God that the choice group doesn't care one iota for its members and supposed allies of religious persuasions.

The other chant, "Racist, sexist, anti-gay, born-again bigots go away!" leaves me as confused as the first chant.

Racist? Who? A congregation of black Pentecostals, or white Baptists? Maybe they mean Korean Presbyterians, or members of the Chinese Christian Church?

Sexist? No way! Beverly LaHaye, a woman, leads the nation's largest women's organization, Concerned Women for America, which surpasses even N.O.W. in membership numbers.

This group is comprised of mostly evangelical women from a diverse ethnic backgrounds and is dedicated to the pro-life cause.

Anti-gay? While there are many homosexuals who claim to be born again, it is true that most pro-life advocates are morally conservative and view homosexuality as a chosen alternative and immoral lifestyle.

Born again? Not all advocates of life are born-again Christians.

Many have no religious affiliation whatsoever. They just so happen to share the belief that life begins at conception, and if any choice is to be made, it should be made before a child is conceived.

Bigots? Using that word makes their chant redundant, as they have already accused the lifers of racism and sexism. All three terms indicate supremacy and a segregationist attitude.

Eventually, the choice forces marched toward the life blockade. Choice forces easily removed the exterior human obstacles and made their way to the clinic entry.

Once they reached the last couple of rows of the life blockade, their advance was throttled by the resolute lifers tenaciously clinging to one another, arm in arm.

The choice forces were just as bound and determined to clear a path to the entry as lifers were to deny access. Suddenly, a young college-age lifer felt something strike her. She looked to the direction of the blow, and she saw her assailant as he kicked at her again and again.

About that same moment, this young woman noticed by her side an older woman in her 60s receiving repeated blows to her head from a man wearing a cast.

The young woman placed her arm in the path of the attackers cast-wrapped blows in an attempt to relieve the other woman of the relentless and vindictive assault.

Finally, the lifers were forced to retreat as the choice forces secured entry to the clinic.

To defend a woman's right to abortion, at least two pro-choice tough guys were more than willing to physically beat on women, young and old.

Perhaps the chants should have said something along the lines of "Get up and run away. Pro-choice power is gonna smash your face!"

At least then there would have been fair warning.

'New blood' in office good thing, Raborn says

"Someone should benefit from all this."

With his campaign, Raborn said he tried to buck the tradition of the local races of the past. He said he saw them as personality and popularity contests, rather than about the issues.

"I can remember getting political fliers from previous elections," Raborn said. "None of them ever talked about policy change or anything else."

He said he did not run to prove himself a better person than the other candidate, but because he thought he had better ideas. He said there is always room for change.

"Even state politics is a local thing," he said. "State-elected officials win in a lot of small, local races with good, local organization."

He said he is excited by the outcome of the national election and about how different the government image alone is going to be.

"My entire adult life, there has been a Republican in office," Raborn said.

"I think this new blood is really going to be good."

Raborn said he thinks there are some members of the state Legislature who would like to get in and change bills that were lost in previous years.

He said he hopes the elected administration will go into the session looking at what is going on now, rather than trying to "get back" at the previous administration by changing all the legislation.

He said he plans to get together with some analysts and have a kind of "post mortem" analysis of the election.

"Not to dwell on it, but to see what we could have done differently," he said. "I'd like to help people out in the future and let them learn from our mistakes."

Detroit officers charged injuries after being beaten on the street near a suspected crack house.

Sgt. Freddie Douglas was charged with involuntary manslaughter, which carries a 15-year sentence, and willful neglect of duty, punishable by a year. The ranking officer on the scene, he was accused of failing to try to stop the beating.

Officer Robert Lessnau was charged with assault with intent to do great bodily harm, a 10-year offense.

The four officers were arrested and faced an arraignment Monday afternoon.

Wayne County Prosecutor John D. O'Hair said three other officers were at the scene of the beating, but there was insufficient evidence for criminal charges.

Police Chief Stanley Knox had suspended a racially mixed group of seven officers the day after Green's death, which heightened tensions in this city known for its integrated police force. The 3,850-member force is 58 percent black. Detroit is three-quarters black.

Green, an unemployed father of five, was beaten with a flashlight, police said.

Jack Gravely, NAACP national director of special projects, said quick action by city officials headed off violence like that which rocked Los Angeles after four white officers were acquitted of beating King, a black motorist.

The two officers also had been named in 25 citizen complaints and five lawsuits.

Sophomore guard quits Cat program

"There's nothing that I can put my finger on, but I just never felt comfortable at K-State."

SEAN ROBBINS

COLLEGIAN STAFF

K-State basketball coach Dana Altman announced Monday that 6-foot, 5-inch sophomore guard Sean Robbins has decided to leave the Wildcat basketball program.

"We're disappointed and surprised by Sean's decision," Altman said. "Our program made a commitment to Sean last year, and we felt very good about what he could contribute to the team. It's really caught us by surprise, and he's disappointed his teammates and the coaching staff."

"This hurts our depth at the wing position, and some of our other players are now going to have to step up and play some different positions for us this season."

Robbins said the decision to leave the Wildcats was in his mind for some time.

"There's nothing that I can put my finger on, but I just never felt comfortable at K-State," he said. "Sitting out last year didn't help, and the car wreck earlier this year just added to it. It's something I've been considering for some time, and I think I would be better off in a different environment."

Robbins said he is considering a transfer back to Emporia State and will make a definite decision in the near future.

For the coaching staff, Robbins' departure still leaves question marks.

"Sean said he wasn't comfortable here, but the confusing thing is why he would leave now after he worked so hard to get back from his automobile accident," Altman said.

"He came back much quicker than most people thought he would, and he showed the same effort last year coming back from a severe ankle injury."

A Waverly native, Robbins came to K-State prior to the 1991-92 season after contacting K-State and requesting to transfer from Emporia State, where he played his freshman season.

Robbins sat out last year under transfer guidelines.

Rugby team takes it to KU

Men's squad wins Heart of America title for 3rd time

BRIAN ANDERSON

Collegian

K-State's men's rugby team captured its third consecutive Heart of America championship title Saturday in Lawrence.

The Wildcats beat Kansas 21-13, moving K-State to 2-0 on the college level.

Through the victory over the Jayhawks, the Cats qualified for the Western Territorial Championship in Houston next spring.

"We totally dominated them," rugby team president Scott Kram said. "We were more physical and had more experience. They were lucky to score against us."

Dow Richards, who plays at a wing position, made three of four penalty kicks from 40 meters away to propel K-State to a 9-0 lead at halftime.

"It was nice to be up at halftime," Kram said. "But we knew Kansas had the wind in the second half. We knew we had to better play better to win."

K-State scored in the second half with tries by flat-half Mike Skahan and loose-forward Matt Robke and a conversion kick by Richards.

Kansas was able to get 13 points on two tries and a penalty kick. K-State had 12 points as the squad battled against the wind.

"They were able to produce opportunities to score," Kram said of the second-half performance of the Jayhawks. "They didn't make too many mistakes. We had to perform at our best to beat them."

Robke and Kram said this squad would be one of the best teams K-State has ever had.

"This is the best team of the last three titles," said Gregg Robke, who played in the last three Heart of America championships. "We have had the type of players to win it. We dominated against Kansas."

"It was nice to regain the title two years ago," Kram said. "We are more qualified this time."

The trip to Houston will mark the 10th time in 13 years the Cats have made it to the Western Territorial Championship. K-State won the championship in 1981.

The winner will meet three other regional championship teams for the National Championship.

"It is going to be a neat experience," Gregg Robke said. "It should be fun."

SPORTS DIGEST

► LADY CATS SIGN ALL-CONFERENCE

Susan Yow, K-State women's basketball coach, on Monday announced the signing of Kjersten Larson of Maple Grove, Minn., to a national letter of intent.

Larson, a 5-foot-8-inch point guard, averaged 8.3 points 5.5 assists and 6.0 steals per game as a junior at Osseo High School in Osseo, Minn.

Larson earned all-Metro and all-conference honors in 1992 and helped lead her prep team to a third-place finish in the 1991 state championships in all three sports.

She was an all-conference selection three years in tennis and one in softball as well, and she has competed in state championships in all three sports.

Larson chose K-State over Creighton and South Dakota, and will join fellow Minnesotans Pam Stoltz and Joey Ward on the Lady Cat squad.

Larson is currently one of 12 finalists for Teen magazine's SportsGirl of the Year award. The winner receives a $10,000 scholarship.

► ROCKIES, MARLINS TO PICK TODAY

NEW YORK (AP) — The Colorado Rockies began what might become baseball's biggest shopping spree ever, signing free agent Andres Galarrraga on Monday, a day before the expansion draft.

Atlanta pitching phenom David Nied was expected to be the No. 1 pick by Colorado when the draft starts at 2 p.m. EST Tuesday. The Florida Marlins may follow by taking by Toronto outfield prospect Nigel Wilson, and both teams figure to finish selecting each of their 36 players by about 9 p.m.

Then, it appears, the fun will really begin.

Because that's when the big names, the Lee Smiths and Shawon Dunstons and Jose Linds, should start flying. And the result could be much more than merely a stocking of two new teams; instead, it could be a major shakeup of the whole major leagues.

Sure, the Marlins and Rockies plan to pick young and inexpensive players, but both teams are certain to select some stars — with the sole purpose of trading them. Danny Tartabull, Jack Morris and catchers Mike LaValliere, Don Slaught, Greg Olson and Damon Berryhill were among the others left off 15-man protected lists.

NATIONAL FOOTBALL LEAGUE

Victory gives Bills division lead

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MIAMI — The last time Miami played Buffalo, mistakes beat the Bills. This time, mistakes beat the Dolphins.

The Bills took advantage of two Miami turnovers and three key defensive penalties to beat the Dolphins 26-20 in an AFC East showdown Monday night. Buffalo, which had five turnovers in a 37-10 loss to Miami last month, this time had none.

Buffalo improved to 8-2, and the Dolphins fell to 7-3. Because of the NFL's tiebreaker system to settle playoff slots, the victory gave the Bills a two-game lead because they have two fewer losses than Miami in the division.

"We're thrilled with the victory, but we know we've got a lot of season left," said Bills coach Marv Levy, who earned his 100th NFL win. "We can only be thrilled for a short time."

"We'll meet again in the playoffs," Miami running back Mark Higgs said, "and we'll be ready for them."

Defensive penalties against the Dolphins helped set up two Buffalo scores, and a pass interference call against rookie Troy Vincent with three minutes left negated a third-down incompletion at the Buffalo 18.

Four Buffalo sacks helped to cool off Dan Marino after he completed his first 11 passes, including touchdown throws to cap Miami's first two possessions. The scoring plays covered 1 yard to Greg Baty and 19 yards to Mark Clayton.

"The fact that we were able to get some pressure on Marino and get some turnovers was a big factor," said Bruce Smith, who had one sack.

The Bills, who trailed 14-3 in the second quarter, took their first lead at 20-17 with a 46-yard touchdown drive following a short Reggie Roby punt. A dead-ball personal foul against Miami's Marco Coleman erased a second-and-13 situation and gave Buffalo a first down at the 12.

Then came the Dolphins' turnovers. Cornelius Bennett recovered a Higgs fumble, Henry Jones picked off a pass that slipped through Keith Jackson's hands, and Buffalo converted both Miami mistakes with short Steve Christie field goals.

Christie also kicked two field goals in the first half, including a team-record 54-yarder.

Jones' interception was his seventh of the year, most in the NFL.

"To beat Buffalo, you have to take the ball away and not give it up," Miami coach Don Shula said. "In this game we gave it up and didn't take it away."

Buffalo's Jim Kelly, who had four passes intercepted by Miami in last month's loss, this time completed 19 of 32 for 212 yards with no interceptions.

"I think we were well prepared the last time we played them. We just didn't play well," Kelly said. "If you looked at the films, things were there. We just didn't execute. Tonight we did."

Miami's Pete Stoyanovich hit two field goals, including a 50-yarder with 4:04 left. But the penalty on Vincent gave the Bills a first down; they then ran out the clock after Thurman Thomas leaped for a 5-yard gain on third and 4.

"I've never had a bigger run — not in junior high, high school, college or the pros," Thomas said.

Vincent was also called for holding in the first half in a third-and-3 situation, which led to a Christie field goal. The Dolphins were penalized 10 times for 99 yards.

"We start out like a house afire. Then we just stopped scoring," Shula said. "We started to shoot ourselves in the foot."

A 25-yard field goal by Stoyanovich in the fourth quarter was negated by a holding penalty on James Saxon. Stoyanovich then tried a 35-yarder, which deflected off the left upright.

"We moved the ball," said Marino, who completed 22 of 33 passes for 321 yards. "We just didn't get touchdowns. It wasn't like they stopped us."

Because Marino completed his final four passes a week earlier, he set a team record with 15 consecutive completions. The old mark of 13 was set by Earl Morrall in 1975 against New England.

COLUMN

Big Eight football is losing its punch

It's been real schizoid in Big Eight football the last couple years. There was a time when an Oklahoma or a Nebraska win was as expected, as unchangeable, as the sun rising in the east.

Are those glory days gone forever? Is Big Eight football past its prime? Probably so.

Fact is, the Big Eight football fortress is showing signs of erosion. Maybe the day will come when people in Nebraska and Oklahoma say, "Yea, but wait 'til basketball season."

Don't think so? OK, here's a pop quiz. Name a big out-of-conference win by a Big Eight football team. Anyone of them. Keep thinking.

Well, let's see, there was Southern California vs. OU and Washington vs. NU. Nope. Michigan vs. Oklahoma State? Get real.

KU couldn't even beat California at home. Bet you won't come up with one, either.

The fact is, the Big Eight doesn't have any big wins over highly regarded non-conference opponents, which is another mark of decline. Sorry Sooners — Arkansas State doesn't count.

Well, for awhile anyway, the league had the Big Red in Huskerland to talk about. The big Nebraska-Colorado match-up — 10,000-3!

Now it's KU-NU for the title!

Nebraska lost early in the season to Washington. But now we got Derek Brown and Calvin Jones in gear, the best tailbacks in the world! Thunder and Lightning, that's what they are.

And now, we have the super-frosh, Tommy Frazier. He's God's gift to quarterbacking, driving one of the best Cornhusker teams ever, and they're rumblin', stumblin', bumbalin', all the way to the Orange Bowl. Hey, maybe they still have a shot at the national championship. ...

(Splat.)

The Clones? 19-10? You gotta be joking. The same team that blew a 90-point lead against KU? That "19" has to be the number of players Iowa State carted off the field, right?

Might it be that the league is just tougher than it used to be? Could be, but I wouldn't bet the farm on it. Teams that are good enough to beat top-10 teams don't lose at home to I-AA Northern Iowa.

Good teams also win on the road. As it turns out, get the Huskers away from their 70,000 screaming red maniacs in Lincoln, and they turn to butter. Check out the near-loss to then 1-5 Missouri.

Despite their shellacking at the hands of Nebraska, Colorado still shows signs of becoming an elite team again in a couple of years. But this year, CU almost lost to 1-9 Minnesota and struggled to tie Oklahoma at home.

Still, they have built themselves a winning tradition. Oklahoma fans want to hang their coach, Gary Gibbs. But it's not really his fault. Any team who has to suit up the dance squad to have a second string should be happy with five wins.

KU has been pretty good, but with big holes to fill from graduation, don't expect the Hawks in the national polls anytime soon.

Heck, compared to the rest of the Big Eight, K-State is a model of consistency. They are 4-0 at home, 0-5 on the road. I call that consistent.

There was a time in collegiate football when teams like NU and OU could dominate on tradition and cutting-edge regimen of weight-training and nutrition. But that will only go so far.

Now the lack of a population base is starting to eat away at the conference while the Floridas and the Californias head to the future. Hasta la vista, Big Eight football. It was fun while it lasted.

Agriculture will not cut faculty, Mugler says

K-State is a good program.

"I really don't think that the fact that the department is so small is holding them back in any way," Nightingale said. "I feel bad. I know of people who have a lot of interest in the program and are intrigued about forestry."

David Mugler, associate dean of agriculture, said even though the programs will be eliminated, the courses will still be taught.

He said other majors also take the classes in the programs that are set to be eliminated. Most colleges have classes that support other majors outside its college, he said.

"In most cases, the same courses are taught because more than those 14 people can enroll in those classes," Mugler said.

The College of Agriculture is different than the College of Arts and Sciences, Johnson said, where whole programs were cut.

"To have a well-rounded agriculture degree, we can't cut whole programs. Students need a variety of classes," he said.

No teaching positions will be eliminated as a result of programs being discontinued, Mugler said.

And Johnson said no jobs will be lost.

"There will be no jobs eliminated, even though the programs have gotten pretty small. Over time, as resources open up, we can do some shifting around," Johnson said.

Ten programs are listed in the mission statement to be either emphasized or continued.

Johnson defined "emphasize" as stressing a specific program. "Continue" means to shift around resources when they are available to those programs, he said.

Johnson said some degrees can be shifted within a department. For example, pre-forestry majors can be moved to park and recreation management.

Johnson said this is a normal evolutionary process.

"Every year, we've had changes, shifts or reallocations. We close positions or change a job position to increase faculty salaries," he said, "If we had more money, we could do a lot of good things with it."

Mugler said the College of Agriculture will not save money just because it cut some programs.

"When you discontinue programs, you really can't save money," he said.

"Teachers are in the same number of forces, and courses are the same. It is difficult to say the amount of money saved."

BILL WATTERSON

Reader responds to letter and turns up the heat for D.W.

YOU'RE ASKING ME?

by Cassandra Duveaux

DEAR CASSANDRA,

I am a female who is a former K-State student. I now have a great job working for a lawyer. I am writing in reference to D.W.'s last letter on Nov. 5.

Does the initials D.W. stand for dimwit? NO woman in her right mind would give you the time of day to satisfy your needs.

It is true women do not have as many rights as do men, but that does not mean we are not human beings!

Satisfying needs is a give-and-take situation. I am married, and my husband satisfies my needs, and I satisfy his. That is just the way things are. You do not take without giving anything in return, because in the long run, you will lose!

If you don't believe me, try it. You will be a very bitter and lonely soul in the years to come. I feel very sorry for you. I am not a sex object, and my husband doesn't think of me as one. He is the breadwinner, and he takes very good care of me. I do the same for him.

If you feel women are only sex objects, you won't be having too much sex in the future. You are the one who needs to wake up and smell the coffee. Your mother gave birth to you, and out of all the women in the world, I would surely hope you don't think of your mother in this light!

Get help, D.W. Life is too short to not have someone to spend it with. I thank God every day for the relationship I have with my husband.

Not Afraid To Show My Name, L.E. DEAR L.E.,

Sorry, but it is my policy (for your own protection) not to divulge the identity of the readers who respond to "You're Asking Me?"

Thank you for your comments. Unfortunately, there are many women who are "not in their right minds," or more accurately, lack the self-esteem to form more constructive relationships with men, and are thus more than willing to enter into the type of situation D.W. described.

Yet, the flip side says there also must be as many men who regard women with little value and are incapable of a mature relationship on any level.

The frequency of sex as a topic in this column would seem to verify the conclusion of many social scientists that too much emphasis is being placed on this aspect of interpersonal relationships in society. While the sexual facet of any relationship is great, to dwell on that specifically and leave out all of the other aspects is like ordering a banana split and eating only the cherry.

But then, you probably would not find this column as interesting.

DEAR CASSANDRA,

This letter is simply to let you know I think you are doing a fine job.

You give students an opportunity to air their questions and concerns. Some of these students may be too shy or scared to ask a person face-to-face these problems. Your column also entertains some students. It gives some, including myself, the needed break from reality.

It is also nice to know that other students are feeling the same things I am. Through your responses, I also learn better how to deal with the situation. I encourage you to keep up the good work, because there are students out there who read you daily and enjoy it. I wish you the best of luck.

With support, A.P., K-State student

DEAR A.P.,

Your letter has to be one of the nicest compliments I have received since starting this column. I hope many others are deriving the same benefits from reading "You're Asking Me?" as you.

The best of luck to you. May you walk life's beaches and never get sand in your shoes.

Body found in plane wreckage

ASSOCIATED PRESS

FORT RILEY — The body of an unidentified man was found Tuesday in a remote area of Fort Riley in the wreckage of a small plane.

Authorities said they believe the plane was stolen from the Junction City airport two weeks ago.

The burned wreckage, scattered over 200 yards, was found by soldiers on maneuvers on the west side of the Army base, a Fort Riley spokeswoman said.

The body was inside the cabin.

Geary County Sheriff Bill Deppish said it may be a single-engine Piper Arrow owned by a Chapman company that was stolen Oct. 30 or 31 during poor weather.

The wreckage was about 10 miles from the airport.

"We believe it crashed that very same night," Deppish said.

He said the victim was burned and would have to be identified through dental records.

Deppish said a soldier who was reported absent without leave from Fort Riley on the day of the theft was a suspect in the theft of the plane. He said the soldier had a pilot's license.

The wreckage was found in a training field north of Junction City, about one-half mile east of U.S. Highway 77.

Fort Riley spokeswoman Jeanette Krueger said military police, the Federal Aviation Administration and county officers are investigating.

Deppish said the wreckage was found on a small hill, and the cockpit and engine were intact.

Investigators couldn't tell whether the plane was trying to land or if the pilot was disoriented. One portion of a wing had its landing gear in the up position.

KANSAS BOARD OF REGENTS

Washburn denied

Committee says state can't support another school now

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — The Legislative Educational Planning Committee declined Tuesday to support Washburn University's plan to be phased into the state regents system during the next five years.

However, Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, whose district includes K-State, a regents school, said she has detected decreasing opposition to Washburn's entry into the state system.

"I think legislators, in generally the last couple of years, are looking at issues on a more statewide basis," said Oleen, who is LEPC chairwoman.

"People know there is a state responsibility for higher education. Washburn is located in one of the most populous counties in the state and is an excellent facility. The question is whether the state can afford it."

A majority on the 11-member panel said admitting Washburn to the state system of higher education would be premature, because the state doesn't have the money.

Engineering plans updates

EDITOR'S NOTE: The Kansas Board of Regents has called for new Role and Aspirations Statements from state universities. This is the third story in a series on what K-State's colleges will do to fulfill this mandate.

Engineering undergraduate programs will maintain a high profile during the Role and Aspirations Report process, College of Engineering Dean Donald Rathbone said.

"Our bachelor of science degree and undergraduate program is of the utmost importance to our college," Rathbone said. "We feel we have a real charge to develop our program to its fullest, and we are not willing to compromise on any level less than the best."

Engineering Council President Jill Dirksen, junior in architectural engineering, said without an undergraduate program, there can not be a quality graduate program.

The Kansas Board of Regents in 1988 commissioned three engineering educators to study three schools of engineering in the state.

One of the study's recommendations was to designate K-State's College of Engineering as the state's comprehensive engineering college.

"Our mission is to provide an educational environment and a

EDITOR'S NOTE: This is the third in a series taking a look at the campaigns and plans of area candidates who did not win their races Nov. 3.

The dominant theme of this year's campaigns was overcoming incumbents and changing the way offices are run.

The campaign of Democrat Michelle Smith, who ran for state senator against incumbent Republican Lana Oleen in the 22nd District, reinforced that theme.

"I think the people thought I was way too young to know anything about life," Smith said. "And I think people were pretty happy about what Oleen was doing."

Smith said the combination of the age factor and her inexperience kept her from winning more votes.

"I think if I had been 35 or 40, it would have been a lot tighter race," she said. "Some of the local papers were surprised at how well I could articulate on the issues."

She said her experiences during the campaign were all positive, and there was never a point when she wanted to chuck it all.

"The whole thing was a really great experience. We enjoyed ourselves, and we learned quite a bit," Smith said, referring to her campaign committee.

Smith and her committee ran their campaign the "woman's way," she said. Men generally have one campaign manager with a staff, Smith said, but most of the time women get a committee that works as a group.

"There was not one individual who had the Manhattan has homeless, too

Going home to celebrate the holidays with family is a luxury taken for granted by many students.

But it's not taken for granted by those who don't have a home.

"Homelessness is on the rise in America and has been for quite some time," said Jacques Gibbons, assistant professor of sociology, anthropology and social work. "It is estimated that from 100,000 to 3 million people in America are homeless, but my guess is that there is a higher number."

Gibbons said many people find it hard to believe that homelessness is a problem in Manhattan.

"It's real easy to deny the homeless," Gibbons said. "In cities like McPherson, Hutchinson, or Manhattan, you won't see 50 people sleeping in the park."

Sonja Redmon, executive director of Manhattan Emergency Shelter, Inc., said one out of every 74 Manhattan residents can be classified as homeless. Redmon said this figure can be somewhat misleading, because many of these people are temporarily living in the home of a friend or family member.

Gibbons said the two major reasons for homelessness nationwide are a lack of employment with high earnings and a lack of

► ON SAILOR'S PRECEDENT, GAY AIRMAN SUES TO BE REINSTATED

PHOENIX (AP) — An airman, discharged after disclosing on national television that he is gay, sued for reinstatement today. Former Staff Sgt. Thomas Panocia, 28, filed the lawsuit in federal court, challenging the constitutionality of the Pentagon ban on homosexuals and requesting an order returning him to his job while the case is resolved. "I could lose my livelihood," he said. "It could also jeopardize my ability to become an officer."

Earlier this month, a federal judge in California reinstated Petty Officer Keith Meinhold at Moffett Naval Air Station while he wages a similar challenge.

ON THE AGENDA

'Malcolm X' finally debuts

Film may raise consciousness about activist's life

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES — After years of controversy and reams of publicity, "Malcolm X" debuts today to a nation largely ignorant of the black activist's life story.

The biographical film is set to premiere in 1,200 theaters nationwide.

Several multiplexes have reserved extra theaters to accommodate an expected surge of moviegoers.

Tobias Price, 17, of St. Louis, said he plans to wait in line as long as it takes to see "Malcolm X" opening night.

"I'm counting on the movie to show me what was going through his head, what kind of man he was, how did he do things, and how he fired up so many people," he said.

The film's makers — director Spike Lee and producer Marvin Worth — labored to make a rigidly factual movie.

Based on "The Autobiography of Malcolm X" and starring Oscar-winner Denzel Washington in the title role, the three-hour, 21-minute epic traces the minister's life from his Harlem hustles to his 1965 assassination.

"Excellent. It should be seen and talked about, and studied and re-examined and raise our consciousness," entertainer Ben Vereen said after a screening Monday in New York, attended by Malcolm X's widow and daughters.

Worth spent 26 years dodging creative and political pressures to bring the film to the screen.

It became enveloped in controversy when Lee ("Do the Right Thing" and "Jungle Fever") replaced Norman Jewison ("In the Heat of the Night") two years ago as the film's director.

There were objections that Lee would turn it into a polemic story, but he stayed close to the autobiography.

War wounds begin to heal

Senators visit Hanoi museum, given photos, relics

ASSOCIATED PRESS

HANOI, Vietnam — Three U.S. senators on Tuesday were given fading photographs, flight suits and other sad relics of American servicemen missing in a war that ended two decades ago but left wounds on both sides.

On what he termed "an extraordinary day," Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass. and Sens. Tom Daschle, D-S.D., and Hank Brown, R-Colo., became the first American officials to tour the Citadel, Hanoi's equivalent of the Pentagon.

Vietnamese officials also gave members of the Senate Select Committee on POW-MIA Affairs military logs of downed U.S. aircraft, a U.S. Army survival manual and a flight helmet. The helmet is said to have belonged to Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., a Navy flier who was shot down over Hanoi and taken prisoner in 1967.

The visit comes amid optimism that the United States may lift a trade embargo and diplomatic freeze it has maintained toward Vietnam since the Communist regime in Hanoi took over U.S.-backed South Vietnam in 1975.

U.S. policy has been that relations with Hanoi will not be normalized until Vietnam offers a full accounting of the 2,265 American servicemen missing in the Vietnam War.

"My hope is that the president will receive the information that we bring back and that when we meet with him, he will listen carefully to the arguments for why there ought to be a U.S. response of some kind at this point in time," Kerry said.

"You cannot make this a one-way street forever."

Vietnam's leaders, eager to mend ties, recently have handed over thousands of photographs of Americans taken during the war and are providing access to archives, prisons and military bases.

Daschle raised the possibility of reciprocating by providing information about Vietnam's MIAs, thought to number about 300,000.

The senators on Tuesday visited Hanoi's Central Military Museum, the government's main depository for items pertaining to the American MIAs.

Museum director Col. Pham Duc Dai said he had two nephews considered missing in action.

In the museum's main hall, Dai also described how he was in a unit that ambushed four Americans in 1967 and dumped their bodies in a river.

He then gave his tiny handwritten diary to the senators to copy.

Expression through dance

K-State Filipinos show cultural traditions, skills

LIANA RIESINGER

Collegian

Filipino students and faculty danced to Asian and Muslim music with grace, balance and creativity Tuesday in the K-State Union Courtyard.

"Dancing is a natural form of expression for Filipinos," said Leticia Sonon, organizer of the performance, which was part of Asian-American Awareness Month.

Damian Bresnan, research assistant in forestry, spent two years in the Philippines with the Peace Corps.

"These dances are done for birthdays and festivals," he said. "It's common for families to sing and dance nightly during and after meals."

The Igorot dance, from the mountain region of northern Luzon in the Philippines, was performed while the dancers balanced two pots on their heads.

Sonon said the Igorots, or Mountain People, have preserved their native dances because of their isolation.

"Women perform this dance to thank God for abundant rainfall and harvest," she said.

Sonon said Filipinos are known for their deep and everlasting love, which is revealed through the carinosa dance depicting a lover's care and affection.

DARREN WHITLEY/Collegian

Nina Ikeda, freshman in biochemistry, tries to stay in step while dancing with Filipino folk dancer Armando Aseneta, freshman undecided, Tuesday in the K-State Union. A troupe of seven performed.

Three colorfully dressed couples clapped while they danced the carinosa.

"The clapping is a means of courting. By doing this, the man attracts the woman," Sonon said.

Dancers of the pandango, which means "candlelight dance," balance a candle on their heads and one on each hand while moving rhythmically with the music.

"This is a difficult dance which requires much virtuosity," she said.

Muslim dances were created by Arab influence in the Philippines, Sonon said.

"Arab traders left a strong imprint of Islam in Mindanao, an exotic southern island," she said.

One dance, pangalay sa patong, includes hand and body movements that simulate the motions of the sea and fish, she said.

"This dance tells of a young man in search for love. He finds the girl riding in a vinta, a boat with a colorful sail," Sonon said.

Animals are the subject of many dances, she said, such as one based on the tikling bird, which comes from the province of Leyte in the Visayan island.

Two people hold two bamboo sticks at opposite ends and beat them together while dancers hop between the sticks.

"This depicts the actions of the tikling bird as it hopes to escape the bamboo traps set amidst the rice stalks," Sonon said.

There are many varieties of dances, including Western and native, she said.

KALEIDOSCOPE FILMS

Movie reflects nuclear family

TED KADAU JR.

Collegian

"Everybody's Fine" is a paradox.

It's also guilt inducing, depressing and probably the best film that has come from the European ranks in a long time. The premise of this Italian story is not only original, but universal.

REVIEW

Directed by Giuseppe Tornatore, who also directed the brilliant "Cinema Paradiso," "Everybody's Fine" is the tale of Matteo Scuro, a man who has spent all of his 74 years on the island of Sicily.

After learning that his five children cannot come visit him, Scuro decides to take matters in his own hands. He strikes off to the Italian mainland and what follows is a magical, yet harsh, reflection on the nuclear family.

Scuro is very proud of his children. In his eyes, they are prosperous, well-adjusted and loving. Yet, the viewer finds nothing could be further from the truth.

The film is played out as Scuro travels from one son or daughter to the next, each time by train, or car. Like any sane person, he hates to fly.

From Naples to Rome, and so on down the road, each child he visits gives the illusion of success. But, you learn his children have been lying to him for years.

His son, who's supposedly a successful politician, is actually a lowly secretary for a Cabinet member. His daughter, who Scuro believes to be a telephone company executive, is a phone operator.

By the end, you realize the children are not only deceiving their father, but they are emotionally unstable and uncaring.

As Scuro, Marcello Mastroianni is exquisite. This Italian cinema veteran brings a performance that is convincing and heartfelt. He leaves you with an overwhelming feeling of not so much sadness, but inspiration. A man who has failed, yet through no fault of his own.

SHOWTIMES

"Everybody's Fine" will be shown at 7 and 9:30 tonight and Thursday in Union Forum Hall, and at 7 p.m. Friday in the Union Little Theatre.

"Everybody's Fine" has subtitles, and until you get used to them, it's a bit hard to follow. Scuro's flashbacks and hallucinations also add a twist to the film. It's not until near the final scene you realize all and find the true quality of the work. But the ride is worth the destination.

OPINION

NOVEMBER 18, 1992

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

IN OUR OPINION

By the Collegian Editorial Board

Athletic Fee needs referendum

THE ISSUE

Student Senate passed a bill that would increase the Athletic fees from $10 to $17 for full-time students.

WE SUGGEST

An issue this important should go to referendum and be decided on by the students.

Student Senate barely passed a $7 increase in the Athletic Fee early Friday morning.

This increased the fee per semester to $17 for full-time students and $8.50 for part-time students. It is part of the student fees paid at registration each semester.

Senate also approved an amendment that required the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics to match the $17 each student pays.

If students should have to bear an increased financial burden, then they should be allowed to vote on it in a referendum.

The fact that the bill passed by a narrow margin is reason enough to put the bill to a referendum. Obviously, many people are not aware of the bill's particulars.

The main concern of senators who want the bill in referendum is that not all student concerns are being equally represented. While senators are elected by the students, they hardly represent all student viewpoints.

The students did not put the athletic department into its debt. Handing students a piece of the load is hardly an answer to a problem in which they have no say except through Senate.

For those who support themselves or don't attend athletic events, even a small increase is enough to cause concern.

Many people believe the marching and pep bands are benefiting the most, but only 11 percent will go to them. In contrast, 81 percent goes to sports such as football, men's and women's basketball, baseball, volleyball and track.

The students should be fully aware of these facts before they decide whether more of their money will be poured into the athletic department's pockets.

This will have repercussions on enrollment fees for years. And only a small percentage of students will benefit from this increase.

The Athletic Fee enhancement bill should go to referendum. Let the students decide how their money will be spent.

► ROLES & ASPIRATIONS

Students respond to threat to programs

Editor,

As the faculty of one of the programs that has been negatively affected in the Role and Aspirations process, we have endured two months of upheaval — endless meetings, presentations and written responses.

We have been both discouraged about what seems to be a lack of appreciation for what we contribute to the University and extremely gratified by the many expressions of support we have heard.

One by product of this "crisis" has been the good fortune that we have had in watching our students in action. We've always known that our students are exceptional, but it has been quite a privilege to witness firsthand application of their skills, talents and energies on behalf of the social work program.

Since many of the most active participants were seniors and upperclass students, the proposed changes would not effect them personally.

They were motivated by their strong commitment to the maintenance of a high-quality educational experience that would continue to provide competent social workers to serve the people of Kansas.

They spoke out for future students and clients, advocating for groups who often have very little voice.

The coalitions that were formed with speech pathology and audiology students were well reasoned and served the interests of both groups. We also commend these students for their persistence.

All of the students behaved consistently in a professional manner, advocating their positions clearly and concisely to individuals and groups within and outside the University community.

Thank you, students, for all your time and energy. Your efforts made a great difference, and your activism was a credit to the social work program and profession.

something new or innovative to say, why keep printing him?

His columns trying to stop the generalization of pro-lifers normally degenerate into a generalization of pro-choicers. Mr. Spradlin vehemently opposed the idea of Sen. Kennedy's bill that would enforce equal rights for homosexuals in the church, stating it would defy the division of church and state. But when it comes to abortion Mr. Spradlin feels the church should have every right to enforce its will on the state.

It has to be a two-way street or not a street at all. I know that there is a right to free speech in this country, and Mr. Spradlin is merely utilizing that right. I just wish he and most of the other columnists had more to say. There are a lot of important things going on in the world. Why can't we explore as many of them as possible?

► FEMINISM AGAIN

You can't call them all bigots or sexists

Editor,

I feel that I need to respond to the backlashing in John Hart's Nov. 16 column.

I question where the origin of the headline came from. "Feminists directly responsible for the family downfall" was not an appropriate title for this column. Mr. Hart in no way attacked women's rights but rather the ideas of extreme feminists. Those of us who happen to agree with John Hart are quickly labeled women-haters, sexists, chauvinists and bigots, when I am far from any of these.

I have no problems with women pursuing a career and supposed equal rights they don't have. I do have a problem with feminists chasing after extra rights, and I do question the relationship between the divorce rate and today's modern feminist thinking.

Conservative leaps to columnist's defense

Editor,

Just a short informal letter to applaud your efforts on writing consistent conservative articles week after week. I have long wanted someone, in this primarily liberal campus, to express the views of others who still value family, religion and personal excellence.

Finally someone comes forward, fearlessly I might add, to articulate the conservative minority views.

My friends and I enjoy your articles and frequently refer to them when engaging those of the liberal persuasion. To that effect is why I decided to write. To quote a personal conservative, Rush Limbaugh, "Those who are tearing down the traditions of this country are losing." But, as he adds, "It is a never-ending battle." So, in conclusion I want to say: Keep up the good work, and remember there are people out here who do still believe that this country has not run out of opportunities.

Editor,

I have begun to think that Mr. Hart and Mr. Spradlin are having a contest to see who can get the most hate mail. Well, I guess I'll give Mr. Spradlin another point.

I always assumed columnists should be involved and interested in a range of political and philosophical viewpoints. But Mr. Spradlin has been rehashing the same things so far this year. If he doesn't have

Feminism only threatens those who are afraid

Call me a man-hater. Say I'm a dyke. I don't care.

I am tired of the feminist label being construed as radical — the old song and dance about how the women's movement is just a narrow faction of hairy-legged females out to destroy the family.

"Feminists are a bunch of radical lesbians who hate men, cooking and razors."

"I want to be a mother, a wife and a homemaker, and feminists are against all of those things."

"The Bible teaches us what women's roles are, and the women's movement doesn't respect or uphold those teachings."

Yawn, yawn, yawn. Blah, blah, blah.

Around every corner the retorts ring out. I scramble relentlessly to the defense of feminism. Searching for a light at the end of the tunnel.

But to no avail. People believe what they want. They search for reinforcement, not enlightenment.

Feminists have been put on the defensive by the "family values" issue and the media. These blame feminists for the breakdown of the American family, the dismantling of capitalism, and accuse us of being able to alter a person's sexual orientation.

Evangelist Pat Robertson has mastered the art of piggybacking society's fears by voicing his own personal vendetta against women. He attacks feminism via homophobia, claiming that if women are allowed equal rights they will leave their husbands and become lesbians. Oh, please!

Aside from the archaic idea that women are only defined by the roles they play within the home — mother and wife — Robertson seems to think lesbianism is something to be fearful of.

Granted, this is a rather safe assumption within the "friendly" confines of the Republican National Convention, but this is real life, where not everyone is afraid of sexuality. And damn if there aren't few proud queers wandering about this campus.

To combat the backlash against feminism, the women's movement has tried to redefine feminism to make it appealing to more women. The tactics that were perceived as extreme or radical were abandoned for more mainstream approaches. Marches and protests gave way to lobbying and infiltration.

The women's movement has devoted a great deal of time and energy in an attempt to dispel the many distortions of feminism. I am sorry to say it has fallen on deaf ears.

Feminism is not about destroying families, eliminating capitalism or recruiting women to become lesbians. Feminism is about creating equal (not to be confused, of course, with "special") opportunities for women and freedom from gender roles — PERIOD.

You call us radical because we are loud. You call us queer because we don't accept the heterosexual status quo of what roles women must play. I say you are the ones who are nuts.

Feminism doesn't need lazy people who are afraid of being strong, of speaking out or of getting angry. A woman who is not willing to call herself a feminist because of how it is perceived is weak. If women are afraid of sexuality, then they don't really understand what feminism means and are a waste of time.

Women need to take back their lives as well as their language. Feminism is ours to define — not the media's or the religious right's. We cannot allow our beliefs to be defined by a group of people who have no respect for us.

Feminists fought to give all women the right to vote, pursue careers and control their own bodies. During these fights, the women on the front lines were attacked and accused in much the same way feminists are ravaged today.

Feminists are not fighting for themselves — they are fighting for everyone.

Your guide to selecting the '92 K-State ambassadors

Chris Hupe

I sincerely welcome the opportunity to serve you and our University as student ambassador.

I served the College of Business Administration as ambassador for two years and found the role exciting and rewarding.

There can be no better feeling than promoting a University of which you are truly proud and believe in passionately.

I believe our faculty, students and alumni are among the finest found in public universities today.

K-State offers various benefits to each of us, but the most notable of these is opportunity.

Students attending K-State are truly empowered. We can go as far as we desire, following by choice whatever personal dreams and aspirations that we may have.

That, my friends, is the true genius behind Kansas State University.

I would love to deliver the message of opportunity and feeling of purple pride to prospective students.

I also welcome the opportunity to converse with our alumni, again spreading the pride and keeping them abreast of activities at K-State.

Thanks,
Chris

universities across the state, K-State became an obvious choice.

Cooperative faculty, a friendly campus and excellence in my desired major made my decision simple.

Now in my third year, K-State has continued to impress me with its concern for students' well-being, diverse campus activities and commitment of ensuring quality education.

Involvement in student government, Student Alumni Board, Chimes and Block & Bridle has allowed me the opportunity to learn about the University from many different perspectives.

These organizations have given me insight into effectively working with administration, alumni and prospective students.

The role of ambassador is one of serving as a representative of the University to many different groups.

My experiences on and off campus have given me the knowledge and skills necessary to fill this position.

I would like to be selected as a K-State ambassador because I feel I can represent "The CATS and YOU in '92!"

I am thankful and proud to be a part of the U, the student body that makes K-State what it is today.

Being your ambassador would be the highest honor and a challenge worth accepting.

Here are the top 10 reasons why I want to be your K-State ambassador:

10. I like to travel around the state, and I don't get car sick!

9. President Wefald would remember my name.

8. Cuba, Kansas — my hometown — would have something to talk about.

7. I could have a legitimate excuse to skip class.

REPRESENTING K-STATE

► Elections for this year's K-State ambassadors are from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. today through Friday near the K-State Union Stateroom.

► The K-State ambassadors, one male and one female, represent the student body at alumni and University functions throughout the year.

► The winners will be announced Saturday during halftime of the K-State-Oklahoma State football game.

► All students who submit an application for ambassador are interviewed by student judges. After this interview, the field of ambassador candidates is narrowed down to 12 to 20 men and women. Faculty judges and KSU Alumni Association representatives then choose the final candidates — four men and four women.

I want to be a K-State ambassador because of my love for Kansas State University.

I have the enthusiasm and fervor necessary to well represent this University and its many positive aspects.

As a student involved in numerous organizations, activities and leadership positions, I would be able to communicate to future students all the opportunities that await them at K-State.

To alumni, I would be able to communicate the excellence that K-State continues striving to achieve and their role in achieving that excellence.

Further, I understand that what makes K-State so special is its strong sense of community. I would love representing K-State, welcoming new students into the community and reminding alumni they are as vital to the community now as they were when students.

I believe Kansas State University is one of the finest academic institutions in the nation.

K-State has something to offer to everyone, and each student adds his or her own unique characteristics.

K-State is composed of a spectrum of aspiring students. We join together to form diversity through unity.

We have a small campus atmosphere with large school opportunities.

A sense of community is created by the excitement of campus activities and generated by the pride of each student.

I am proud to be a K-State student for all the following reasons and many more.

K-State is where each promising student strives for a goal.

It is a place noted for faculty dedication to helping students receive the best college education possible.

K-State is recognized nationally for its prestigious scholars, intramural and varsity sports, student publications, service organizations and Landon Lecture speakers.

K-State achieves excellence through tradition and advancement. It's a place where friendships are built on solid foundations, and lifetime memories are developed.

I would be honored to demonstrate my pride for K-State by representing the University.

Heather Riley

For as long as I remember, there has never been any doubt where I would go to college. Watching Willie, the cheerleaders and the band cheer the Cats, I knew I would go to K-State.

This created a dedication to K-State, but it also led me to take K-State for granted.

My years here have been full of amazing opportunities in leadership, academics and personal growth. I have served K-State through Student Alumni Board, Chimes, Blue Key honorary, Union Program Council and student government.

My experience in these organizations has given me exposure to all nine colleges, as well as to a range of clubs, government councils, and service organizations across the University.

These experiences have also led me to realize the opportunities for leadership, initiative and extracurricular education at K-State are unique. K-State's dedication to preparing students for life, not just for a job, is a sincere and valuable commitment.

I've enjoyed having the chance to tell others about the quality education I am receiving.

As a K-State ambassador, I would be able to focus on this in speaking to alumni and prospective students as a student representative.

It would also allow me to use the knowledge and skills I have gained at K-State to promote the University, to return the gifts I have been given.

special way.

I am proud to say I have survived four years of countless lectures, late-night homework and tests.

I am proud to say I have become involved in campus honoraries, service organizations, my living groups and student/alumni relations.

It is these academic and extracurricular experiences that are the foundation for my qualification to be a K-State ambassador.

But, you ask, why do I want to be an ambassador? Simply stated — Purple Pride.

My enthusiasm and sincere belief that K-State is:

■ a place to enjoy (or endure) classes;

■ a place to cheer the Cats to victory;

■ a place to make and build friendships;

■ a place to continue developing your future and what it will hold; and

■ a place with Purple Pride!

K-State offers numerous opportunities for all students.

These opportunities provide challenges for students to grow, learn and enjoy the K-State experience.

Most importantly, the K-State experience will provide many lifetime friends and great memories.

I have expressed how I feel about K-State.

As an ambassador, I would be motivated to positively represent K-State.

My father taught me at a young age something about the cattle business that applies now — that you should only sell something if you believe in it.

Well, I believe in K-State.

To be a successful ambassador, a great deal of time is needed, and I welcome the chance.

In addition, I feel my communication skills and knowledge about the campus will be beneficial in working with prospective students as well as alumni.

Serving as your ambassador would be an honor and a privilege.

Thank you for reading this note.

Wildcat basketball is back

Jerrell Roberson, freshman center, runs through ball-handling exercises in the Wildcats' final practice Tuesday before their exhibition game at 7:30 tonight in Bramlage Coliseum against Fort Hood AAU.

STEVE ROCK

Collegian

KU, it isn't.

The Fort Hood Amateur Athletic Union basketball team, or Fort Hood AAU, comes to Manhattan at 7 tonight to play an exhibition game against K-State at Bramlage Coliseum.

And although the Tankers, a squad from a military base in Texas, are not a Division I-A team, Cat head coach Dana Altman said the Wildcats may not be prepared to face them.

"We're not comfortable playing an exhibition game," he said. "We're still another week away from being ready."

"Our players just have not had enough time to get things done."

The Tankers come to Manhattan with a 10-1 record, having lost their first game of the season Monday night to New Mexico State, 94-81. They have beaten the likes of Kelly Air Force Base, Lackland Air Force Base, Tyler junior college and Fort Bliss.

"It will give us an idea of how we're doing," forward Deryl Cunningham said. "But it won't give us a good idea."

"The Big Eight season is where it counts."

Probable starters for tonight's contest, Altman said, will be the individuals who have the most Wildcat experience.

Seniors Cunningham and Aaron Collier will probably start underneath. Askia Jones and Vincent Jackson should be starting guards, and sophomore Brian Henson is likely to get the starting nod at the point guard slot.

Though the Cats have yet to play a game, the new season for K-State has gotten off to an ominous start.

Within two weeks of the start of practice, two players left the squad.

On Nov. 8, transfer center Don Richhart, who had been the team's tallest player at 6 feet 11 inches, left the team to concentrate on his studies.

Monday, sophomore guard Sean Robbins, who transferred from Emporia State after averaging nearly 16 points a game, unexpectedly announced his decision to leave the basketball program.

"It is going to set us back for a while," Altman said. "It hurts our depth."

One position in which the Cats lack proven depth is at the center position, a position Richhart was supposed to play.

Returning Wildcats at that position are Hamilton Strickland, who saw limited action in just 13 games last year, and George Hill, who redshirted last year.

Joining Strickland and Hill will be freshman Jerrell Roberson. Roberson averaged 21 points, 14.5 rebounds and seven blocks per game as a senior in Mississippi.

And Roberson, Altman said, might have the slight advantage.

"Jerrell has come along a little quicker than what we thought he might," he said. "I like his effort. I like his athleticism. We've been pretty pleased with Jerrell."

K-State was 16-14 last season. The Wildcat season ended when K-State lost to Notre Dame 64-47 in the second round of the NIT Tournament.

Of hunting pheasants and eating peanuts

"I'm gwine go shoot my forty-fo' Won't be a pheasant for a mile or mo'"

—Cotton-Eyed Joe

I hunt, therefore pheasants am. There is a pheasant in the field with me today.

It is strutting across the footpath, calm as a chicken, and becoming camouflaged in the Konza Prairie tallgrass.

I have been trying to shoot these things for two weekends in two states. My first thought is to shoot.

But hunting is not allowed on the Konza Prairie. My arm does not cradle a shotgun. Instead, I have a bag of peanuts and a book, which are not much good for killing birds.

Why, then, is my first instinct to try and kill this pheasant?

It is the first idea many Kansans have when they see wild animals. To what purpose?

Here I am, alone in a field with a bird. It is the pheasant's field by right of squatter sovereignty.

The ring-necked pheasant species is a much more recent straggler to Kansas than us Swedes.

But we came here to farm and not fight for kings. The pheasant was brought here to be shot.

The most compelling argument for hunting is the population management angle. Without predators, these pre-selected fast breeding species need human intervention to prevent overpopulation.

But this argument becomes confusing with imported game birds. Did we bring these fowl over just to keep their numbers low?

This bird, hiding in the tallgrass, exists in relation to me. It would not eat the seeds of North American plants if my ancestors hadn't found them enjoyable to hunt and eat.

So, I think about hunting. I sit down and eat my peanuts, cracking one open, first with thumb and forefinger, then chucking the nut onto my tongue.

It rolls to my canines and is crushed.

What is the difference between eating a peanut and eating a pheasant?

This is a curious question. Both objects are cultivated, though the peanut is managed more directly.

I have never hunted for peanuts. There is no license for peanut trapping.

Human society developed in phases, I've heard.

It began with nomadic hunting and thence went toward agriculturalism. From hunting birds to planting peanuts.

It may be intellectual folly to call peanut planting more sophisticated than plugging at birds with shotguns.

Still, I enjoy unsophisticated shooting at pheasants.

The difference between the peanut and the pheasant is that the peanut was not pursued by me.

If this sounds silly, it is. It's elitist, capitalistic and oppressive in theory.

This is a blighted world. According to its rules, that which is terrible survives.

In this world, I would be called feeble if I drove hundreds of miles to stand in a snowy field at daybreak, looking for fat, brown birds.

But power comes out of the barrel of a gun.

I say power. This is also silly. Perhaps we who shoot things misinterpret what death is, what is communicated in the blank stare of a dead eye.

Herrmann joins Cat coaching staff

SCOTT ABEL

Collegian

When K-State basketball coach Dana Altman went recruiting for his basketball team this year, one of the holes he needed to fill was on his coaching staff.

One of Altman's assistant coaches, Jim Kerwin, left last spring to take the head coaching job at Western Illinois. Altman decided to get some help from a veteran and hired Pete Herrmann, former head coach of the Navy basketball team.

"Coach Altman wanted me for my experience," Herrmann said. "I've sat in the big chair and coached a conference champion and a conference tournament champion."

"Dana asked me to join the staff, and the administration and the coaching staff have welcomed me with open arms."

With the addition of Herrmann, Altman's assistant coaching staff, which also includes veterans Ken Turner and Greg Greshing, has a combined total of 34 years experience at the Division I level.

Herrmann's resume includes a long tenure at the Naval Academy in Annapolis, Maryland. He spent six years as an assistant for the Midshipmen before becoming head coach in 1986.

In his first year at the helm, Navy went 26-6, won the Colonial Athletic Association championship and went to the NCAA tournament.

"In my 12 years at Navy, we had five teams with 18 wins or more," he said. "We had a lot of role players that did one thing real well."

Herrmann has also worked with a lot of big men, including professional stars like David Robinson and Shaquille O'Neal. He said that instructing athletes is one of the things he enjoys most.

"Coaching isn't just a job for me," he said. "It's also part of an enjoyable teaching experience. That's what has been great so far this season."

"The players have been working hard on their fundamentals and to improve themselves each day. The school has a great tradition, and they want to maintain that."

Herrmann's association with K-State basketball began in 1990. He helped coach a team of college stars in the Olympic Festival tournament in Minneapolis against former Wildcat coach Lon Kruger.

"Kruger was the coach of the north team, and I was the assistant for the south team," he said. "We hung around together for a couple weeks at the hotel together, and Lon talked to me a lot about his success at K-State."

"K-State's basketball tradition is well-known back east, and I had met Coach (Jack) Hartman and Coach (Tex) Winter. So I knew a good deal about the program already."

Herrmann also spoke at a coaches clinic at Marshall University, where Dana Altman was coach.

"Coach Herrmann has a very good reputation in basketball circles," Altman said. "He's had experience at an awful lot of levels, and has a lot of good overall basketball knowledge."

"He's an energetic coach and understands what we want to do here, and we couldn't ask for a better guy for the job."

But last season, Navy finished with an 8-20 record, and Herrmann was released.

"We had five freshmen that were scoring nearly 50 percent of our points," he said, "but we just didn't win enough games, and that was the bottom line."

"But I'm not looking backward, and I try to give everything I have."

Herrmann's plans for the future at K-State are simple for him to spell out.

"What I'm here for is to help coach Altman win games and help players improve," he said.

"I really can't see how it could get better. You've got a great league, and a great school. I'm really looking forward to this."

► TENNIS PLAYER DISCIPLINED

Senior Susana Labrador's default at last week's ITA Rolex Championships at Omaha, Neb., stemmed from disciplinary reasons, K-State tennis coach Steve Bietau said Tuesday.

"The default was related to the problems we had. It was just between me and Susana," Bietau said.

After a first-round bye and a win, Labrador lost by default. Bietau, who had refused to comment on the situation Monday, didn't say what brought on the reprimand, or whether it was a situation within the team or off the court.

"I don't know if it's appropriate to comment on that," he said. Labrador refused comment Tuesday.

► DAVIS LEAVES JAYHAWK SQUAD

LAWRENCE (AP) — Ben Davis, a 6-foot-8 sophomore power forward at Kansas, has decided to transfer beginning next semester, Coach Roy Williams announced.

Davis, who started seven games last season for the Jayhawks, averaged 6.6 points and 4.5 rebounds a game in helping Kansas to a 27-5 season in 1991-92.

"I don't have any regrets about my decision to come to the University of Kansas, and I have no hard feelings toward anyone here," Davis said.

"It just hasn't worked out like I had hoped. I don't know where I'll end up, but it will probably be closer to my home in Florida."

► MARINERS TRADE MITCHELL

NEW YORK (AP) — Kevin Mitchell, a disappointment for Seattle last season, was traded from the Mariners to the Cincinnati Reds for pitcher Norm Charlton Tuesday night.

The deal was announced just after the expansion draft ended. Mitchell, who will be 31 in January, led the major leagues with 109 home runs from 1989 to 1991 with the San Francisco Giants.

He was traded with pitcher Mike Remlinger to Seattle last winter for pitchers Dave Burba, Mike Jackson and Bill Swift, and the Mariners hoped he would break loose at the Kingdome.

Instead, nagged by injuries and bulging physique, he hit only nine home runs. He batted .286 with 67 RBI.

Colorado, Florida expansion teams draft 36 players

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — The Colorado Rockies and Florida Marlins began the expansion draft Tuesday going in different directions, but ended the same way — with a torrent of trades found Walt Weiss, Danny Jackson and Jody Reed new teams.

Seven trades were announced immediately after the draft.

Bryan Harvey, Charlie Hayes and Jack Armstrong were among the most prominent players who were picked and stayed put.

Lee Smith, Danny Tartabull, Shawon Dunston and Jose Lind were not selected though all were available.

Instead, Florida focused on minor leaguers from the start, while Colorado concentrated on lower-priced veterans.

When it was over, Rockies manager Don Baylor instantly announced his starting lineup for next April. The team includes Alex Cole, Jerald Clark and Dante Bichette in the outfield and a battery of No. 1-pick David Nied pitching and Joe Girardi catching.

"We went after the guys we wanted right away," Baylor said.

The Marlins, meanwhile, stayed away from big leaguers until the middle round of the three-round draft. Overall, 20 of Florida's 36 picks have played in the majors, while 25 of Colorado's picks have.

"We're thrilled with the way everything fit," Marlins general manager Dave Dombrowski said.

"We're in a position where we feel we'll be able to sign free-agent players at the major-league level who will help our ballclub."

Both clubs boosted their rosters with trades, which could not be announced until after the draft.

The Marlins made four deals in which they traded:

■ Catcher Eric Hefland, drafted from Oakland, back to the Athletics for shortstop Weiss and a player to be named later.

■ Jackson, taken from Pittsburgh, to Philadelphia for 21-year-old pitchers Joel Adamson and Matt Whisenant. Jackson, who also pitched for Pittsburgh, went to his fourth team this year.

■ Pitcher Greg Hibbard, selected from the Chicago White Sox, to the Chicago Cubs for shortstop Alex Arias and third baseman Gary Scott.

■ Pitcher Tom Edens, taken from Minnesota, to Houston for pitchers Hector Carrasco and Brian Griffiths.

The Rockies didn't miss out on the frenzy, either, as they traded:

■ Second baseman Reed, drafted from Boston, to Los Angeles for pitcher Rudy Seanez.

■ Outfielder Kevin Reimer, taken from Texas, to Milwaukee for Bichette.

As expected, Nied was the top pick in the draft. He was Atlanta's best pitching prospect, but the Braves left him off their protected list, and the Rockies took him.

Toronto outfield prospect Nigel Wilson was taken next by the Marlins.

It figured that the two best teams in 1992 would be tapped to start stocking the National League clubs that might be the worst in 1993.

After that, it was clear which way the Marlins and Rockies were going in the first round of baseball's first draft since Toronto and Seattle picked 16 years ago.

Colorado looked at the present, and Florida looked to the future. They did agree on two things, however — both teams avoided high-priced talent, and both went after pitching, taking a total of 41 hurlers.

Colorado's first 11 picks had all played in the majors, and those taken in the first round had combined to play in 2,794 major-league games.

The average age of the Rockies' first-rounders for opening day 1993 was 26.7. Only five of the players will be 25 and under by then.

Of Florida's 13 picks in the opening round, only six had been in the majors, combining for 622 games. They took 10 players who will be 25 and under by next April, for an average age of 24.6 on opening day.

The only odd name in the Marlins' lot was Harvey, who led the American League with 46 saves in 1991 but missed most of the last year with an elbow injury. The California Angels owed him $11.25 million for the next three years.

Harvey, 29, was the oldest player taken in the first round. Later, Florida took Edens from Minnesota and Jim Corsi, also 31, from Oakland.

The Marlins also grabbed another familiar name in Junior Felix from California.

"Our intent really wasn't to go with youth," Marlins owner Wayne Huizenga said. "Remember, there's still more to come."

Maybe, but Dombrowski sought advice from Pat Gillick, general manager of the World Series champion Toronto Blue Jays, and he was advised to draft young.

Bicycle Theft Prevention Tips from KSU Police Department

1. Lock in a well-lit public area if possible.
2. Never leave an unlocked bike for "just a minute."
3. Realize that a cable or chain alone will not protect your bike. Even the thickest cables can be cut with bolt cutters or hack saws. Use cables or chains only as secondary locking devices (wheels, etc.) and U-shaped Locks as Primary locks.
4. Record the serial number of your bike, and register it with your local police department!

KSU Police Department would like to thank all who stopped by our display at the K-State Union on November 11. The winner of the drawing for the bicycle lock and "Bad Bones" was Andrew McCullough, 500 Sunset.

dedication to scholarship so that all engineering students can reach their full potential, both in the study of engineering and as a person," Rathbone said.

Four anticipated areas of emphasis in engineering for the 1990s are the environment, materials, manufacturing and software engineering.

"The college has a long history of successfully incorporating new, high-demand topics into existing, traditional departments," Rathbone said.

"So we will follow this pattern for those areas."

Operations research in industrial engineering is being considered by the Kansas Board of Regents, he said, as well as a master's degree in software engineering.

A personal and professional development program for undergraduates is also planned for the 1990s.

Students Taking Action for Rewards and Success, or STARS, will provide extracurricular skills-related training, education and development that is important to everyone involved with the college, Rathbone said.

"The program has already had two meetings," Dirksen said.

"In the second meeting, they worked on communications by writing memos to me on problems they had with the college. This really benefited the Engineering Council, as well as them."

Dirksen said she thinks STARS is a good program, because it offers hands-on work instead of just going through the motions.

Rathbone said it is important for the college to emphasize recruiting and retaining minority and female students.

Doctoral programs would also be boosted, he said.

Research centers and institutes proposed to be enhanced are the Hazardous Substance Research Center, Advanced Manufacturing Institute, Center for Transportation Research and Training, Center for Energy Studies, Institute for Computational Research in Engineering and the Center for Building Studies.

Rathbone said the college needs to increase the faculty and faculty salaries, because it is overextended in teaching and research.

"We have a critical need for additional faculty if we are to maintain quality undergraduate programs and achieve a nationally recognized research program," Rathbone said.

Salaries in the college are about 20 percent below those in K-State's peer institutions.

Rathbone said this has been consistently listed as the area of greatest need in the college.

As for changes, Rathbone said the engineering technology program will move to the K-State-Salina campus.

This move will affect 85 of the college's 2,400 undergraduates.

"This will allow us to strengthen other areas," he said.

"I feel it will become a flagship for the K-State-Salina campus. It is a win-win situation."

This move would help finance the emphasis of other areas of the college, Rathbone said.

"We will get to keep the budget and faculty salaries here, which will be a major source for us," he said.

"This is where the major source of funds will come from."

The college is also proposing to eliminate its master's degree in agricultural technology management and the Office of Radiation Protection and Research.

Washburn still waiting to join state system

A Kansas Board of Regents committee review of the Topeka university's programs should be completed first, the panel said.

Members of the review panel are Regents John Montgomery of Junction City, Donald Slawson of Wichita and K-State President Jon Wefald.

The LEPC approved a motion by State Rep. Richard Reinhardt, D-Erie, a former board member.

The motion said that, based on the state's tight fiscal condition and the Regents' study of Washburn, the committee is making no recommendation at this time on the admission issue.

The LEPC asked the regents to make another report on Washburn's status next November.

The committee did not turn its back entirely on Washburn. It adopted a resolution urging creation of a grant program to help needy students pay their tuition costs, saying it should provide assistance not only to students at regents schools but also to those at Washburn and private colleges.

The effort to make Washburn, the last municipal university in the nation, a part of the state regents system has been going on for nearly three decades. It has intensified in the past five years.

Former Gov. Mike Hayden proposed admitting Washburn to the state system, but the Legislature would not do it. Gov. Joan has said she favors Washburn's admission, if and when the state can afford it.

The six state universities and their constituencies have opposed Washburn's admission on grounds it could dilute the amount of money each of them would receive from the state.

Washburn officials had proposed a five-year phase-in at an estimated cost of $11 million to the state.

The regents review will include looking at the state's financial ability to fund another university; a detailed academic study of Washburn's programs, faculty, student body profile and demand for programs by students; and identification of various options related to affiliation.

Manhattan programs aid homeless affordable housing. Manhattan has 262 public housing units and 175 Section Eight housing units that provide for those who may not otherwise have a home, said Jai Atkinson, public housing officer for the Manhattan Housing Authority.

Atkinson said anyone who has a low income and is either over 18 years of age or is a parent can apply for public housing.

Atkinson said the criteria for Section Eight housing are tougher to meet. Tenants must find a landlord to agree to the program. They pay the landlord 30 percent of the rent, and the housing authority pays the rest.

The housing authority has a preference list of people who are homeless, who pay more than 50 percent of their income for rent and utilities, who have been forced out by disaster or who are living in substandard housing.

Atkinson said the public housing units have a waiting list of 125 people, and Section Eight has 150 waiting. The average waiting period is about two years, he said.

Redmon said not only are people unaware of the homeless, but many are also unaware of the Manhattan Emergency Shelter at 831 Leavenworth St.

"Our primary purpose is to shelter, clothe and feed the people who come here," Redmon said.

Redmon said the shelter has five sleeping rooms and can house up to 26 people.

Single males in their 30s are the majority at the shelter, he said, followed by mothers and children.

Most of the shelter's clients come from referrals, Redmon said.

"Usually they've been evicted, or that person they've been living with can't let them live there anymore," Redmon said.

"Parents will tell them to move out, or else there is a divorce or some type of domestic problem."

Redmon said the shelter also teaches job and resume skills, and gives preparation for the General Equivalency Development test.

The Flint Hills Breadbasket is a local organization that also provides services for the homeless.

Breadbasket director Shirley Bramhall said they collect food from businesses and individuals, and then give the donations to one of 41 recipient agencies who distribute the food to those in need.

She said it has also developed an educational center at the Breadbasket, 905 Yuma St.

"This teaches people to help themselves," Bramhall said. "We offer cooking classes and classes on nutrition through Riley County Extension. We also teach budgeting skills, life skills and fathering skills."

"All of us are more or less moving to the point to where we are not just a Band-Aid. We are looking for solutions."

Campaign a learning experience

final say in how things were done," she said. "There were a number of times when even I was overruled, but we always had good creative juices flowing."

Further experiences with the campaign taught Smith things she said would help her in any field.

"I learned how to balance my time," she said. "We learned that the written word can have a powerful effect and to choose words carefully."

For example, Smith said she wrote a brochure that mentioned "a fundamental right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness." She said many pro-choice advocates had taken that to mean she is pro-life, and her committee took a lot of complaints about it.

Now that her own campaign is over, Smith said she would work on any that requested her help.

"Being part of the Democratic Party, we really help each other out," Smith said. "I know we could have done a lot of things differently, but our motto was 'We're learning.'"

Smith said running for office again is not out of the question, but her main interest now is education.

"I'm just focusing on school and getting my degree," Smith said. "I'm going to find my niche, and if I run for office, it won't be for a long time."

DRINKING & THE HOLIDAYS

Mothers promote ribbon campaign for safe driving

Local MADD chapter asks motorists to display commitment to safety

BILL SPIEGEL
Collegian

Last Thanksgiving, 281 people died nationwide as a result of alcohol-related automobile crashes. On Christmas, 561 people died in alcohol related accidents.

These statistics, provided by the National Highway Traffic and Safety Association, have convinced the Kansas Mothers Against Drunk Driving organization to promote the "Tie One On for Safety" campaign, designed to increase awareness of drunken driving during the holiday season.

Project Red Ribbon encourages motorists to tie a small red ribbon to a visible location on the vehicle.

The ribbon is a symbol of a person's commitment to celebrate sober, said Diana Poot, Riley County MADD administrator.

"When people tie them on, we mean bicycles, trikes, anything with wheels," Poot said.

Max Sutherland, state administrator of MADD, said that the program has been popular in the past.

"The campaign has been met with very good reception. It is a very simple program, with high visibility," Sutherland said.

This is the seventh year MADD has sponsored the campaign.

Last year, 7,000 ribbons were distributed in the Riley County area.

A goal of 9,000 has been set for distribution during the holiday season this year. Washburn University's Phi Delta Theta fraternity will assist with preparation and distribution of over half a million ribbons this year.

Ribbons are available at the KSU and Riley County police departments, or by notifying Poot.

The efforts of MADD have paid off. During the 1991 official counting period for Thanksgiving, Christmas and New Year's Eve, only one person died as a result of an alcohol-related crash.

Rosalie Thornburgh, administrator for the Kansas Office of Traffic Safety, attributed this to an increased effort by law enforcement to enforce drunken driving laws, increased public awareness on the dangers of drinking and driving, and increased usage of safety belts.

Poot said that the success of the red-ribbon campaign has inspired a campaign for summertime holidays.

"Holidays are a wonderful time, just don't drink and drive," Poot said.

Creating crafty gifts

Holiday gifts can be fun, attractive and reasonably cheap — if you make them yourself. Ben Franklin Crafts has craft workshops throughout the year.

An average of six to eight people attend the workshops, said Jan Zelch, instructor and floor manager of the store.

"I will instruct up to 12 people per class and a minimum of three," she said.

As for costs, the registration fee depends on the workshop. For the workshop on making bows, the cost is $2.50, and for the beginning quilting workshop, it is $9.50.

This registration fee does not include the cost of supplies, which also varies, depending on the type of workshop.

"The prices are very reasonable," Carol Schleif, 46, said. "The supplies for the creative twist angel were about $8, and the registration fee was $4.50."

Lucy Williams, 38, agreed.

"I attended the padded album workshop, which was $20," Williams said. "It was a fun class and well worth the price."

Monta Harris, 44, said she thought her first workshop was fun.

"I wanted to get away from work and relax," she said. "So, I encouraged my friends to go along."

Schleif said the workshop is more fun with friends.

Some of those who attend the workshops said they go to learn how to make new crafts and use them to create gift ideas.

"I like to make crafts for myself," Schleif said. "However, I plan on making some crafts for my nieces, which will be good keepsake items."

Lori Vainer, 25, said she plans on making them for someone else, but then she ends up keeping them for herself.

Some of the various workshops include Creative Twist Angel, Beginning Quilting, Friendly Plastic Jewelry, Beginning Oil Painting, No Sew Sweatshirt Jacket, Creative Twist Basket, Bow Class, Tatting, Wheat Weaving, Folded Christmas Ornaments and Block of the Month.

"The most popular workshop now is the No Sew Sweatshirt Jacket," Zelch said. "We have a waiting list to take that workshop."

A sign-up sheet is located at the front desk, and the class fee must be paid when you sign up. However, refunds are given if a cancellation is made 24 hours in advance.

Phone registrations can be reserved for 24 hours until payment and a sign up can be made.

SHOPPING

Different strokes for different folks

MEGAN MULLIKIN
Collegian

The mall at Christmas time has two personalities.

One — a beautiful place to shop with Christmas decorations, Christmas music in every store and the smiles of gift-giving shoppers. Two — a mad house of angry last-minute shoppers fighting their way to the check-out stand to buy their gifts.

Kim Kirk, senior in English, said she enjoys shopping at the mall during Christmas because of the atmosphere. She said she has tried to buy gifts through catalogs but has had no real success.

"I really get into the Christmas spirit when I do my Christmas shopping. It makes me feel good to buy gifts for people," Kirk said.

"I have sworn to never order from a catalog again. Once, I ordered clothes for my sister, and it took over two months to finally get the size I ordered."

Many people do enjoy shopping by catalog during the Christmas season. Evelyn Russell, catalog supervisor at J.C. Penney, said convenience is the biggest advantage of catalog shopping.

"The main thing is the convenience. When you order through the toll-free number, it costs very little more than if bought at the store. It usually only takes two to three days to get there," Russell said.

College students away at school can receive gifts through the catalog from their parents, Russell said.

She said it makes it easy for the students, because they can just pick up the gift their parents paid for from out of town.

Russell said the biggest disadvantage for catalog shoppers is that the buyer is not able to see the product before they receive it.

"I always like to see the quality of my gifts before I buy them. Sometimes you can be deceived by a picture," Kirk said.

Another problem with shopping by catalog, Kirk said, is the return procedure.

"You can't try on the clothes, and if they don't fit, you have to package the outfit back in a box and send it back. After that, it may take three or four more weeks until you get what you wanted in the first place," she said.

Joel Viterna, senior in hotel restaurant management, said he loves shopping by catalog for himself, because he can buy clothes you wouldn't normally see in the stores.

"Clothes out of a catalog are clothes that not everybody has. It's more individual," Viterna said. "If you order clothes from a store in California, probably no one will have the same thing here, and you can be your own person."

Ann Molitor, sophomore in pre-occupational therapy, said she tried buying her gifts on one of the home-shopping channels.

"I've ordered a bracelet for my sister on the shopping channel for Christmas. I haven't received it yet but they said it would arrive in a couple days," Molitor said. "I just happened to be flipping through the channels, and I decided to try it out."

Useful gifts best for grads

MEGAN MULLIKIN
Collegian

Soon-to-be graduates are in need of Christmas gifts that can help them in the real world.

"I think anyone who is graduating soon should be collecting the items that can help them when they get that first job," said Kelli Lackey, senior in elementary education.

Tom Meier, senior in hotel and restaurant management, agreed. He said if he could have anything he wanted for Christmas he would ask for a new car or lots of money. However, in reality, Meier said what he needs is appropriate clothes for the business world.

"I need suits, because it's the time now that I'm going to be a business man, and I need to look professional," Meier said.

Graduates may need luggage, a briefcase or furniture if they are moving away from home to work, Lackey said.

Troy Naylor, graduate assistant of employment services at the Career Planning and Placement Center, used to interview for Boeing.

He said a briefcase or a portfolio is an excellent gift for a graduate. Quality of the briefcase is not important in an interview, as long as it is presentable, he said.

"Everyone knows how much money college students have," Naylor said. "I don't think the price would be a concern. No cardboard boxes with a rubberband around it, but you really don't have to be concerned with the expense. What they're looking at is inside, anyway."

Different majors require different types of portfolios or briefcases. Sometimes, a student will not need to bring a briefcase to an interview, Naylor said.

"It is different for different disciplines. For example, for art and architecture students, it would be very important to display their work," he said. "I think it looks a little pushy bringing a briefcase into an interview, purposefully for show."

Betting Henning, technical supply manager at Varney's Book Store, said students usually buy inexpensively when shopping for an item used on campus. For interviews, however, students usually want something more classy, she said.

Prices for briefcases and portfolios at Varney's and the K-State Union Bookstore range from $30 to more than $100.

Sandy Barnes, supply clerk at the Union Bookstore, said many seniors are wanting presentation cases instead of portfolios. She said presentation cases have a multi-ring binder, which can be used to display samples of work, and the portfolios only have pockets.

Sweetheart season

STORY BY JODY LYNN

'Tis the season to get engaged.

Surprising a sweetheart with an engagement ring for Christmas may be a traditional way of "popping the question," but according to local jewelers, many couples are now looking together for the style of ring they will select.

"A lot of couples look together, and then the lady will excuse herself for a while. That way she has narrowed it down to two or three styles she likes, but she'll still be surprised," said Joseph Maggio, a salesman with Gordons Jewelry in Manhattan Town Center.

"In the past few years, we've started seeing more couples coming in together and making the decision on a ring together. They're also starting to pay for the rings together. There's no intimidation on the female's part to help pay for her ring," said Mike Danenberg, owner of Danenberg's Holiday Jewelers, 425 Poyntz Ave.

Maggio said typically the number of people looking at engagement rings goes up at least 35 to 40 percent during the holiday season.

"It's very true that our sales go up significantly during the holidays. Lots of engagement rings are given during the holidays, if not for Christmas," Danenberg said.

Within the past five years, Danenberg said the trend in diamond engagement rings has been a move to bigger diamonds and larger bands. He said typically couples are looking at diamonds that are a half carat or larger in size.

"Several years ago college students' tastes began moving toward larger diamonds. We sell as many marquis-cut diamonds as we do rounds. That cut lends itself to new and exciting designs. Plus a half-carat marquis will look considerably larger than a half-carat round," Danenberg said.

He said the price for larger diamonds has grown with the demand for them, and a bigger price tag has not deterred buyers.

Maggio said younger couples are still looking at smaller diamonds in the five- to 15-point range. Rings in this size group typically cost between $120 and $250, he said.

Those looking to buy a half-carat diamond of an average cut and clarity can expect to pay between $1,500 and $2,000, Maggio said.

"Students are really starting to shop around to try to find the best diamond for the best price," Maggio said.

Oval- and emerald-cut diamonds are also popular. Danenberg said in the past few weeks he has sold other stones as engagement rings.

"It's unusual to see the colored stones used for engagement rings, but it does happen. This week, I sold a ring with an emerald center stone as an engagement ring, and cost was not a factor in the choice of an emerald," Danenberg said.

He said occasionally people ask for custom-made jewelry. Some couples have bands cast from jewelry that have been in each of their families. Others choose to use additional stones or Black Hills gold to complement the setting.

Special Holiday

OH, CHRIS

STORY BY DEB WHITSON

Looking for the perfect evergreen offers traditional outing for friends, family.

Ah, the pine needles, the scent of the outdoors. Images of younger days when the whole family gathered 'round and fought about the decorations.

Anything come to mind? Yes, the traditional Christmas tree will usually evoke fond memories of Christmases gone by and bring anticipation of this year's festivities.

So where do they come from?

There are several farms in Kansas and throughout the United States that supply local retailers with everything from Scotch pines to Norwegian sheared firs, said Terry Olson, owner of Eastside and Westside Markets in Manhattan.

"We get most of ours from a grower in Silver Lake," she said. "They are small growers, and there are a number of others in Kansas."

Olson said she has used a grower in St. John's on a regular basis, as well as growers in Washington, Kan., and Salina. She also imports some 'upper-end' trees from Canada, Oregon and North Carolina.

"These are Noble firs, which are grown on plantations, usually in Northwest Oregon," Olson said. "And the Frazier fir, which is known as the Cadillac of Christmas trees."

She said the Frazier has a silver underside and is very thick and lush. The other popular fir is the Douglas, which she called the "Charlie Brown" tree, because it is very thin and unsheared. It is also the least expensive of the firs.

Olson said most of the trees sold around here are Scotch pines, but some are Virginia and White pines. Scotch pines have sharp needles and might not be preferred for families with small children, Olson said.

Another popular retailer is the Optimist Christmas tree lot. Run solely by volunteers, the profits go toward the funding of many youth service projects.

"The main thing to remember is that everything we make goes right back into the community," said Clyde Scott, local Optimist treasurer. "We have 27 projects a year, and I would say conservatively that we helped about 2,110 kids last year."

Scott said the Optimists get their trees from Michigan, Virginia and Washington state. The organization deals with wholesalers because they can round up a wide variety of trees, which has made the lot successful in the past, he said.

"We have tried Kansas dealers and not had any problems with them," he said. "But we need to make sure we have a consistent supply, and with the weather around the state, it's hard to depend on them for this large number of trees."

He said the Optimists get about 3,000 trees a year. They deal with a number of return customers, because people tend to return to the same place year after year. Another yearly tradition is the donation of a tree from the Optimists to the Manhattan Public Library.

For those who aren't satisfied with just walking through a few trees, picking one out and taking it home, there is another option.

"Pick-and-cut" tree farms offer a traditional outing for the whole family. The shoppers are invited to walk through acres of growing trees, choose a favorite from the many rows, which are labeled to help remember where your choice is, and have it cut down before their very eyes.

"We have a shaker to get rid of the extra needles, too," said Lindy Gallaher, part owner of the Gallaher Tree Farm west of Manhattan. "It's a real family thing, people make a ritual out of it."

Gallaher's father, Harold, was the head of the forestry department at K-State for a number of years, before he retired in 1980. His dream was to open a pick-and-cut farm for his family to run, and he did just that when he retired.

"He and I planted all the trees together in 1981," Lindy Gallaher said. "He was the one who had the brainstorm and found the land in the right location."

The trees take about five years to mature enough to sell, Lindy Gallaher said. His father, who died in 1989, was able to see his dream realized when the first trees were sold six years ago.

During the Christmas season, which begins the day after Thanksgiving, the farm employs about a dozen outside workers. For the rest of the year, Gallaher and his 16-year-old son do most of the work.

Concern increases for recycling pines

Environmental problems are changing the way people do things on a day-to-day basis.

Even the most traditional aspects of people's lives, like the purchase of a cut Christmas tree, are not safe from increasing environmental concerns.

One alternative to a cut tree is to purchase a live "balled and burlaped" tree, which can be planted after Christmas.

Horticultural Services of Manhattan is one area landscaper who deals in live trees.

"The environmental issue has slightly increased the sale of live trees," said Carl Meyer, president of Horticultural Services. "I consider this type of tree to be a very renewable resource, because they are harvested and re-planted just like other crops."

Meyer said he usually has a few White and Austrian pines but will deal strictly with Scotch this year.

"We seldom sell trees larger than 4 to 5 feet tall," he said. "The ball is 16 to 18 additional inches, which makes it a lot taller, and 6 feet is about the height most people want."

The "ball" is made up of roots and soil, similar to other landscape trees. Meyer said it is important to keep these trees moist, but the main consideration is not to keep them inside very long.

"This type of tree is grown and kept outside, and gets used to cooler temperatures," he said. "When it is taken inside, it acclimates to the warmer temperatures and comes out of the dormant stage."

When the tree is taken outside to be planted, it could go into shock from the abrupt temperature change, Meyer said. This is one disadvantage to getting a live tree, because it can't be enjoyed for as long inside. He recommends no longer than six to 10 days.

He said the cost of live trees is as much as three times the cost of cut trees. But the live Christmas trees don't carry the guarantee that other landscape trees have.

"We guarantee all our trees, but we can't do it with the live Christmas trees," he said. "The reason is that we don't have control over what environment the tree will be in."

Meyer said that if a person bought a live tree year after year, he would need a tree lot to accommodate all of them.

Meyer said he will also sell cut trees. This is a plus for him and for the consumer, he said, because he can point out the alternatives.

If a live tree is purchased, the problem of getting rid of it — and being friendly to the environment — after the holidays is easier than people think.

Paul Miller, manager of Tuttle Creek State Park, said the park will offer a drop-off program for used Christmas trees again this year.

"We've been doing this for about six or seven years," he said. "It's just become the natural thing for people to do."

He said the park office is the drop-off point at Tuttle, but there are a few places in the city limits where people can take trees. They will be taken to Tuttle by the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department.

From the office, the fishery biologists take the trees to different spots around the lake and to Pottawatomie State Lake. The trees are submerged in the water near prime fishing areas, to draw fish in and make fishing more enjoyable for the anglers, Miller said.

"We're talking about 3,000 trees," Miller said. "So, moving them around takes a lot of coordinated effort."

Miller said the program will continue indefinitely, because it has become so popular during the past few years.

"I guess it has increased some since all the recycle stuff became so big," he said. "But people have always done it anyway."

ing," he said. "That takes a while, because we have 10,000 trees."

The amount of work involved in keeping the trees thriving is more than people would think, Gallaher said.

In the spring, replacement trees are planted for the ones that have been cut or have died. Then the grass has to be mowed all summer, as well as shearing the entire 12 acres of trees to shape them in July.

Gallaher's daughter and wife work at the farm also, and all of them enjoy the time spent there, he said. He is an insurance salesman, and his wife is a dietitian.

▲ Jeff Cuberdale, Manhattan, and his son, Tyler, choose a tree at the Gallaher Tree Farm, west of Manhattan.

"It's great for us, because it's totally different than what we do for a living," he said. "Lots of families come out, some bring their camcorders, make a big production of cutting the tree and do it themselves."

The Gallahers grow Austrian, Scotch and White pines, and keep the prices "rock bottom," which translates to about

RETURNING MERCHANDISE

Watch refund policies

KRISTEEN YOUNG
Collegian

Buying the perfect gift isn't always easy.

And sometimes the receiver ends up returning the gift.

Gift buyers should be aware of what the return policy of the store is before they make a purchase.

In a press release by the Better Business Bureau, Andrea Marling, president of the BBB of Northeast Kansas, said shoppers should be alert when buying gifts during the holiday season.

"Before purchasing holiday gift items, be sure to check the store's return and exchange policy," Marling said.

"A store is not obligated to accept items for refund, exchange or credit except in cases where the item is defective or was misrepresented. And Kansas stores are not required by law to clearly post their return policies."

There are some stores that do not post their policies. However, many have voluntarily set up policies to let customers return articles purchased at their stores.

Exchanges, returns for credit and refunds are services that some stores provide to encourage shoppers purchase from them.

Marling also warned not to throw away receipts or tags from articles.

"The policies usually require that the goods be returned within a specified time period and be in new condition," she said.

"In most cases, a store will require a sales slip or some other evidence that the article was actually bought there and not at some other store. It's also a good idea to keep the packaging, just in case the store must return the item to the manufacturer."

Shoppers should look for tags on items that state "All sales are final." In some stores, these tags are on items that cannot be returned.

A store has every right to use these tags on some or even all of their merchandise. This policy is often used on sale goods, items sold at the end of a season, those used as floor models or items of an intimate nature like undergarments or bathing suits.

"Regardless of the store's policy," Marling said, "if the goods you have purchased were misrepresented or are defective, you have every reason to expect the store to provide a suitable substitute or refund, or make proper repairs."

Marling also said that the laws in all states require a store to make good in such cases.

An alternative to returning merchandise to the store is to return it to the manufacturer.

Some products have written warranties stating what a customer should do if anything is wrong with the merchandise.

Buyers should read the warranty on the product before returning it to the store to find out whether they should mail it to the manufacturer or take it back to the original purchase site.

TRAVEL

Going home for holidays takes planning for some

DEB WHITSON
Collegian

Those lucky students who only hail from as far away as Wamego or Salina — or even Goodland — should count their blessings this time of year.

During Thanksgiving or Christmas, the effort involved in getting an inexpensive flight home can crush even the most hardy traveler. But there are a few tips that can help ease the pressure.

"It's always cheaper if you book two months in advance," Ilisa Waterman, junior in anthropology, said.

"But then if you have to change your schedule, that can cost like 50 bucks extra."

Waterman travels to her parents' home in Richmond, Va., at Christmas, Thanksgiving and for the summer every year. She said the rates are always higher this time of year than at any other time.

"Mom and dad pay for mine," she said. "But they get a military discount. So it helps."

Waterman's father is in the army, which is how she happens to be at K-State. Her father was stationed at Fort Riley, and she said she liked it so much she decided to go to school here.

"I wouldn't be able to stand it if I couldn't be with them over the holidays," she said.

"Moving around with the army, my parents are the only thing that's constant, and I miss them so much."

Waterman said the airports are crowded when flying at Christmas.

"They are always decorated and hyped," she said. "Sometimes it's hard to get around and get to your connections, but you just have to be pushy."

Denise Pottle, junior in elementary education, said she agreed that the airports can be crowded.

"I've never had any problems at KCI," she said. "But Denver can be pretty bad."

Pottle, who attends K-State on a golf scholarship, travels to British Columbia twice a year. Her parents and boyfriend live there, and she also follows the book-in-advance method.

"It's up to you if you want to wait till the last minute," she said. "But you risk losing a seat."

Pottle said her fares are always cheaper during the summer, which is good since there is no such thing as a student discount. She said there are sometimes discounts when using certain credit cards.

"I always go for a really long time," she said. "And I know it makes a difference in the rates how long you stay. So I've never had a problem in that area."

One local travel agent agreed that it makes a difference what days people travel.

Everybody dreams of Toys, Toys, Toys

Story by Christina Carbajal

Thirty-seven more shopping days until Christmas. One might think it's closer, because Christmas paraphernalia has deluged various stores since before Halloween.

But what are children, young and old, asking Santa to bring for them on Christmas?

For young girls, Barbie dolls are consistently one of the top five choices, said the manager of a local toy store.

Every year Mattel releases the $45 Holiday Barbie, which quickly becomes a valuable collectors item.

"Doll collectors buy them, leave them in the box, and they easily go up to $100 in value," the manager said.

"The first Holiday Barbies — issued in the late 1980s — are probably worth around $200 or $300 now," he said.

Any dolls, especially those that move or perform bodily functions, are popular this year.

"Dolls that do things, not just blink their eyes, are popular holiday items," Sara Switzer, Wal-Mart toy department manager, said.

Switzer said Roller Blade baby, which skates on its own roller blades, is in demand as well as Magic Potty Baby. This baby has its own potty trainer and actually goes to the bathroom. Colored water is used.

Barbie also has a hook in this area with Teen Talk Barbie. She asks questions, such as, "I like to shop, don't you?" and "Are you my best friend?"

Not to be left out, boys have their own corner on the market when it comes to dolls.

Hasbro issued a special anniversary Hall of Fame G.I. Joe for the holidays. It's the classic 12-inch doll, complete with electronic fight sounds that come from the doll's battle weapons.

Godzilla is making a come-back, the toy store manager said, and movie figures are also big.

For example, Batman and "Beauty and the Beast" items are hot because the two films were recently released on home video, the manager said.

"Batman figures, all accessories or anything with Batman on it is selling," he said.

A power-punch Batman is part of this year's line. This figure can battle with its arms, which pop up when its back is pushed.

"'Beauty and the Beast' is taking over the 'Little Mermaid' market this year," he said.

The younger-age market seems to be brimming with gift choices. So, what's new for the teen-age or college-aged crowd?

Super Nintendo and the Sega Genesis system are again top runners for holiday gifts, the manager said.

"Nintendo's Street Fighter II is selling this year," he said.

Sega has brought out an advanced aspect for video games. In partnership with Sony, it has added a CD Rom player and laser disc to the system.

Players can use the CD games on the new system and also hook the system up to a stereo system to use it for regular compact disc playing. The new addition costs about $200.

On the less technical side, board games that involve role-playing are popular among college students and older adults.

Dark World, a variation of Dungeons and Dragons, Battle Masters and Hero Quest may be some of the high-selling games for the holiday.

Word games such as Huggermugger, a word association game, and the ever-popular Taboo game also are top gifts.

Murder/crime games, such as How to Host a Murder, have been getting many requests, he said. This game comes in different versions and time frames that range from The Wall Street Scandal to The Chicago Capers to The Class of '54. These games are comparable to the older Clue board game.

Switzer said she added five extra isles to hold the surplus merchandise. However, buying is kind of slow, the toy store manager said.

"The big influence is the warmer weather," he said.

"People go into the mall when it's colder, and then they realize that Christmas is really not that far away."

He also cited the elections as a deterrent to buying early. He said that everyone has been watching television to see how economic decisions will be made. This influences how cautious they will be when it comes to buying toys.

But if buyers want popular merchandise, they should get it in the first week of December, or they may never get a chance to get it again, he said.

"Two ladies came in one day and said they finished their shopping last month," he said.

But he said he also has seen many last-minute shoppers in past years coming in the store Dec. 24, looking for what's hot.

A Sega Genesis display awaits test players in Sears in Manhattan Town Center. A CD Rom player is one of the newest advancements added to the Sega system.

Stuck to the screen

Your guide to movies to watch for during the holiday season.

HOLIDAY MOVIE SNAPSHOTS

► Here is a look at the big holiday movies. Budget figures are supplied by Weekly Variety.

1. "Home Alone 2: Lost in New York," 20th Century Fox. $28 million. The first "Home Alone" grossed $285 million. A favorite to repeat. Opens Friday.
2. "Aladdin," Disney. $25 million. The animated musical might be more magical than "Beauty and the Beast." Great legs at the box office. Opens Nov. 25.
3. "Distinguished Gentleman," Disney. $30 million. Eddie Murphy hustles his way into Congress, and probably atop the box-office charts. Opens Dec. 4.
4. "A Few Good Men," Columbia. $40 million. Tom Cruise in uniform again, Jack Nicholson, Demi Moore and a lot of hot courtroom scenes. The studio hopes Cruise returns to "Top Gun" form. Opens Dec. 11.
5. "Hoffa," 20th Century Fox. $42 million. Danny DeVito directs Jack Nicholson as the feared Teamster boss. Solid pedigree. Opens Dec. 25.
6. "The Bodyguard," Warner Bros. $31 million. Kevin Costner protects Whitney Houston. Will her bland songs strike a spark with moviegoers? Opens Nov. 25.
7. "Malcolm X," Warner Bros. $42 million. At three hours and 15 minutes, this film tests the patience of Spike Lee's most devoted fans. Opens today.

9. "Toys," 20th Century Fox. $34 million. Robin Williams stars. A great concept: Williams running a toy company. But is it too dark? Opens Dec. 18.
10. "Trespass," Universal. $14 million. Ice-T and Ice Cube star in what was once titled "The Looters." May make off with bundles. Opens Dec. 23.
11. "Forever Young," Warner Bros. $21 million. Mel Gibson frozen solid, defrosted 50 years later. Any freezer burn? Opens Dec. 18.
12. "The Muppet Christmas Carol," Disney. $12 million. Michael Caine plays Scrooge, but much of the Muppets may have died with Jim Henson. Opens Dec. 11.
13. "Lorenzo's Oil," Universal. $27 million. Nick Nolte and Susan Sarandon find a cure for their child's illness. Potential yuppie sleeper. Opens (limited) Dec. 30.
14. "Chaplin," TriStar. $35 million. Robert Downey Jr. puts on top hat and mustache. Inspired choice or pale imitation? Opens (limited) Dec. 25.
15. "Leap of Faith," Paramount. $32 million. Steve Martin in a serious role. You saw how well it worked for Billy Crystal in the mirthless "Mr. Saturday Night." Opens Dec. 11.

Culkin's still a kid despite his stardom

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — What stands 53 inches tall, weighs 78 pounds, is worth more than $5 million and is balancing precariously on the ledge of a balcony 24 floors above Central Park?

Mugging for the camera, pointing a pair of mismatched high-top sneakers at the lens, 12-year-old Macaulay Culkin looks anything but nervous. Grinning maniacally, he points to the sweeping skyline.

"Ahhh, what a city," he says sardonically, then jumps off the ledge and bounces into the hotel suite.

Ahhh, what a kid. Like Kevin McCallister, his alter ego in the phenomenally successful "Home Alone" and the upcoming "Home Alone 2: Lost in New York," Culkin strikes a familiar pose. He flops down on the couch, grabs a remote clicker and turns on the television.

In both films, Kevin indulges his love of junk food when he conveniently loses his family. So does Culkin. During commercial breaks in "Looney Tunes," he heads for a table laden with chips, salsa, avocado dip and huge chocolate chip cookies.

Ahhh, what a life. It only gets boring when Culkin, better known as Mack, has to settle down in a chair and answer a lot of serious questions. Though two years have passed since "Home Alone," Culkin looks eerily the same. He's now in seventh grade but looks and acts younger.

"It's funnier," says Culkin about "Home Alone 2."

Then he admits he hasn't seen it nor read the script, just his lines.

"I really don't know that much about it. I'm going to see it in 11 days. I think there's a premiere or something."

At this point, it doesn't matter if Culkin can describe the plots of his movies or not. As long as he just shows up, the movies do well.

"Home Alone" was the third biggest moneymaker of all time, grossing $507 million, just behind "ET" and "Star Wars."

Culkin reportedly was paid $100,000 for "Home Alone," and then pocketed $1 million for a co-starring role in "My Girl."

In between, he collected $500,000 for three days work voicing a cartoon.

Before "Home Alone," Culkin was a respected New York child actor, having begun his career at the age of 4.

Now he's the biggest child star since Shirley Temple. As Kevin, the mischievous, resourceful scapegoat of the absent-minded McCallister clan, he's struck a national chord as Everykid.

But when you ask him if being a superstar has changed his life, he squirms.

"Mmmmm," he says, scratching his head in mock puzzlement. "Not really. I'm just me. Just Mack."

Wait a minute Mr. Postman

Senders often cause packages to be late, because they don't allow enough time for delivery

JODY LYNN
Collegian

Neither rain, nor snow, nor dark of night will keep the mail from being delivered.

But during the holiday season, it may take a little longer for packages to get from one place to another.

Marvin Roth, postmaster at the Manhattan Post Office, said it's wise to think ahead when sending packages before Christmas.

"If someone wants to make sure their package gets where it's going by Christmas Eve, we encourage them to mail it as soon as possible," Roth said.

"We'll get it delivered, but you can't tell what the weather will be like then, and you never know when a snow storm will cause delays," Roth said.

The heavy week for the post office will begin around Dec. 19 and go up until Christmas Eve, Roth said. He said the amount of mail coming through the office increases between 25 and 50 percent during the holidays.

Getting packages to their destinations quickly is something that people have to pay for, Pansy Price of the Mailing Center, said.

"Everyone wants it fast and cheap. The two don't go together," Price said.

Express mail delivery by the post office will get a letter to its destination by 3 p.m. the next day if it is mailed by 5 p.m. Priority mail will get a two pound letter or package to its destination in two days for $2.90.

United Parcel Service can deliver one-pound packages anywhere in Kansas for $3.55. The price increases as weight and the distance the package will be sent increase.

UPS can deliver packages to either coast in four days. Second-day air service, which delivers in two days, and next-day air service are also available for quicker service.

The price for shipping is approximately double second day air, and double that for next day air.

Overseas mail sent by surface should have been on its way by Oct. 1, because packages and letters sent by this method are delivered by boat.

For air parcel post, letters and packages should be mailed no later than Dec. 2 and for the Middle East no later than Nov. 25.

Also, packages to be delivered to members of the military through APO and FPO box numbers should be in the mail by Dec. 1.

The Mailing Center will also package gifts to be sent.

For those packaging themselves, Roth has some good suggestions.

Using a sturdy, reinforced cardboard box that is not too big for its contents and filling in gaps with ample packing material such as bubble wrap or styrofoam pieces will keep the contents safe. Roth also said to include the address it is being sent to as well as a return address in case the package is not delivered.

Roth said to avoid using brown paper or twine to secure a package, because they can be snagged in the shipping process. Instead, pressure sensitive tape should be used for extra security.

If a package is lost in the mail, Roth said to contact the local post office and it will put a trace in the dead-letter office.

Packages should be addressed on only one side.

Roth said if a box comes through the office addressed on several sides, the postmark may be missed by an employee and it will be returned to the sender.

Insurance on packages mailed through the post office can range from 75 cents to $6.20 and must be requested at the time of mailing.

Price said packages sent by UPS have the first $100 of insurance included in the shipping price.

"We'll get it delivered... but you never know when a snow storm will cause delays."

Manhattan postmaster

MAILING CHRISTMAS

- Overseas packages and letters sent by surface should have been on its way by Oct. 1, because they are delivered by boat.
- Air parcel post packages going to overseas should be mailed no later than Dec. 2. If they are to be sent to the Middle East they should be mailed no later than Nov. 25.
- All packages going to the military through APO and FPO box numbers should be sent no later than Dec. 1.
- Post office express mail will reach its destination by 5 p.m. the following day, if mailed by 3 p.m. However, priority mail will get a two pound package to its destination within two days for $2.90.

Travel home isn't easy for some

"The most popular days that people travel are 'blackout' on fares," said Shelly Gowdy, owner of Travel Unlimited. "That means they can't give the really cheap fares on those days."

Gowdy said this is to encourage people to travel on different days, so that there is not such a bottleneck effect. She said most markets offer 14- or 21-day-advance discounts, but Southwest Airlines has about the best deal in its market.

"They have this 'friends fly free' thing going on," she said. "So if two people are going the same place, it ends up being really cheap."

Gowdy has worked in heavily-traveled cities as an agent, but said she enjoys the people in Manhattan.

She books flights for university clients over semester breaks that include married students, faculty members and others who work at K-State.

"It's really important to develop a rapport with an agent," she said. "Especially if you are going to be here for four years or more — that's a lot of holidays."

She said she calls her regular clients has the same philosophy. They are not in the business for the profit, but for the enjoyment of having people make the farm a part of their Christmas traditions.

"We have people come all the way from Topeka to get the really big trees," Gallaher said. "I guess they charge 50 or 60 bucks for trees over 15 feet, and ours are never more than $35."

and lets them know when there is going to be a special rate. She also encourages them to look at the larger newspapers and to watch CNN.

"They always know when the rates are going to change," she said. "And I try to go to that extra effort for my clients."

Gowdy said she is very busy right now booking for Thanksgiving, and that Christmas business is steadily getting stronger.

"That shows you that a lot of people don't book in advance," she said. "But some people are waiting for that last minute drop in the rates."

She said the good things about that method are outweighed by the bad. If a person books in advance, the rate is guaranteed low, and will only cost more if the person changes flight times. If the person waits, the availability of flights is limited, with the possibility of not getting there at all.

Gowdy's advice is to book early, and get to the airports early for all flights.

"And start thinking about spring break," she said. "It's just around the corner."

THE PRESIDENTIAL TRANSITION

Bush counsels Clinton in D.C.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — President-elect Clinton swept triumphantly into the capital Wednesday and had a "terrific meeting" with President Bush, he said.

Clinton solicited advice on more than a dozen potential global problems he could inherit.

Nine weeks before his inauguration, Clinton also made a symbolic visit to a crime-plagued black business district.

"I'll do my best not to get out of touch," he promised well-wishers. Thousands of people strained against police lines for a glimpse.

"I hope you'll never be disappointed," he told one supporter.

Clinton said he and Bush discussed global tinderboxes such as Russia, Bosnia and Somalia.

"He was very candid," the president-elect said. "He gave me a lot of insights. The American people should be pleased."

The White House characterized the talks as "warm and informative." The meeting ran 45 minutes over schedule.

The visit was the first stop on a two-day whirlwind of high-powered meetings and social engagements with the lions of the Washington establishment.

Clinton's visit was intended to pave a smooth transition and signal the new president's readiness to deal with Washington insiders.

Demonstrating his willingness to be a good neighbor to the community, Clinton went directly from the White House to Northwest Washington for a walking tour of one of the city's black business districts.

Clinton said he was trying to demonstrate his recognition that Washington is "a city — not just government buildings" — made up of "people who don't want a handout but a hand up."

Clinton ducked into the Hamilton Seafood Grocery, the Hamilton Laundromat and other stores near the Georgia Avenue intersection.

There have been eight homicides in the last year within a mile of the neighborhood that Clinton visited.

Rainy weather and dark clothing contributed to a car-pedestrian accident Wednesday night.

Ihdkwa R. Tribue, sophomore in elementary education, was driving south on 17th Street just south of the K-State Union.

As she tried to turn left onto Anderson Avenue, she hit John F. Husband, non-degree student in English, after he stepped off the sidewalk, said Officer John Meyer of the Riley County Police Department.

"The walk sign was flashing," he said.

"Due to the weather and the dark clothes he was wearing, she just didn't see him."

Meyer said Tribue had a green light.

Cindy Riemann, senior in industrial engineering, was crossing the intersection just in front of Husband.

"We were both standing on the curb, and at the walk light I marched out in front," she said.

"I had just stepped onto the (opposite) curb when I heard a hard thump. I turned, and he was rolling on the ground. It was a pretty loud thump."

Riemann said she went to Husband's aid immediately.

"I dropped my backpack and took my coat off and put it over him," she said.

"I tried to remember what I had learned in first aid."

Husband was transported to Memorial Hospital where he was treated and released.

He refused comment on the accident Wednesday night.

Meyer said at the accident scene that Tribue would not be issued any citations.

Later Wednesday night, he refused to comment on that possibility.

"I tried to remember what I had learned in first aid."

STUDENT SENATE

Allocation to be debated

Resolution on HIV testing also to get first reading

AMY WRIGHT
Collegian

After last week's nine-hour marathon meeting, student senators may get a little more shut-eye tonight.

With the Athletic Fee debate completed, Student Senate will move ahead this week with the Educational Opportunity Fund allocation for fiscal year 1994 and a statement to Lafene Health Center.

In the past, EOF has been as hotly contested as issues like the Athletic Fee, Chief of Staff Jim Persinger said.

Faculty Representative Phil Anderson said he has not heard of any opposition to the allocations for 1994, but it has been a lengthy process in the past.

EOF funds, collected from tuition, are returned to Student Governing Association to be allocated to groups and causes.

Senators heard the first reading of the EOF bill at the Nov. 12 meeting and will move to questions and debate tonight.

Senate will also hear the first reading of a resolution encouraging Lafene to improve HIV and pregnancy testing procedures.

Concerns were raised when Jerrod Burns, freshman in psychology, came before Senate Nov. 12 to discuss what he called "problems" with procedures.

Burns said he was disturbed to find HIV testing is not anonymous. He also said Lafene charges more than other regional testing centers, such as Riley County Health Department and Watkins Health Center at the University of Kansas.

EDITOR'S NOTE: This is the final part of a series taking a look at the campaigns and plans of area candidates who did not win their races Nov. 3.

Unseating an incumbent is difficult, and for Democrat Gloria O'Dell, the task was immense.

She ran against Republican Sen. Bob Dole, a 24-year congressional veteran and the U.S. Senate minority leader.

Final election figures showed Dole with 64 percent of the vote, with O'Dell gathering 32 percent and Independent Christina Campbell-Cline with 4 percent.

Despite her loss, O'Dell said her candidacy, termed "Gloria versus Goliath," raised awareness in voters. She compared it to Ross Perot's independent presidential campaign.

"I think what my candidacy did was to tell, in public dialogue, that there are problems in people's daily lives," she said.

During her campaign, O'Dell said she concentrated on letting people talk about their problems.

EDITOR'S NOTE: The Kansas Board of Regents has called for new Role and Aspirations Statements from each state university. This is the fourth story in a series on what K-State's colleges are doing to fulfill this mandate.

Funds for emphasizing College of Business Administration programs would come from within the college, Dean Daniel Short said.

Improving undergraduate programs would take three steps, he said.

First, a survey would be conducted to determine the teaching practices of the top business colleges in the nation.

The second step would be surveying recent K-State business graduates to learn how the program prepared them for the job market, Short said.

The final step is a needs assessment survey for corporations and businesses to learn what they expect of graduates.

The general business program has been recommended for discontinuation because of declining enrollment and declining interest from the marketplace.

Grant Janke, junior in finance and Student Senate representative from the college, said he and other Senate members were concerned about the proposed cut

The K-State Agricultural Honorary of Gamma Sigma Delta has selected Bernie Hansen as the 1992 Distinguished Alumnus Award.

Hansen, a 1970 K-State graduate with a degree in agricultural education, is the president of three branches of Flint Hills Foods. The three include a meat plant and cheese plant, both in Alma, and a meat plant in Wamego.

"I became the manager of Flint Hills Foods in 1971 and in 1980, I bought the company and expanded," Hansen said.

He said he employs 70 people, and his company processes 100,000 pounds of meat weekly.

Hansen will receive the award at 6:30 tonight in the K-State Union. His speech, "Making the Free Enterprise System Work for Kansas" will reflect how his K-State experience led to prosperity.

"In my speech, I will tell how attending K-State will help in the business world," he said. "It helped me to set goals and standards for myself and to make contacts through the University."

Hansen's sons are following in his footsteps. They co-own Flint Hills Foods in Alma with their father. His son Shon graduated from K-State in 1991 with a bachelor's in marketing and works in the sales department at Flint Hills Foods. Hansen's son Todd is a senior in business at K-State.

"It is a big honor to be recognized by my peers and associates in the agriculture field," Hansen said.

Don Kropf, professor of meat science in the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry, is a personal and professional friend of Hansen's.

"Bernie is an aggressive businessman who has created jobs for many people in the community," Kropf said. "His entrepreneurial abilities have benefited many."

Kropf said Hansen has served Kansas and the nation as well as the community.

He is on the inspection and legislative advisory committee and was the first chairman of the board at the Kansas Value Added Processing Center, Kropf said. In 1990, Hansen was named small businessman of the year by the K-State small business development center.

Nationally, Hansen has served as the national treasurer and president for the American Association of Meat Processors and has been on the board of directors for four years.

"Bernie is highly respected and deserves the recognition he is receiving," Kropf said.

Animal-head trophies out of paper

Education student creates life-like pet heads as hobby

LANE ALLISON
Collegian

Sometimes it takes a head to get ahead in the art world. That is what Brian Weiert, sophomore in speech education, is hoping for.

For the past two years he has been working on what he calls Humane Heads. Weiert has these life-size renditions of animal heads mounted gallery-style in his home. The life-like animal heads are constructed from chicken wire and papier-maché, then coated with latex paint. Weiert said he got started in this new art form while making some home improvements.

"When my wife and I moved into our home, we had these zebra-striped sheets and curtains, and we needed something to put on the wall that matched," Weiert said. "So, I went out to the garage and came back with my first head, a zebra."

Weiert said he showed the zebra to his family and friends, and they were all impressed.

"I have two brothers that are both high-school biology teachers," he said. "When they saw the zebra, they both wanted one to put in their classrooms. Before I knew it, I was doing heads for them, and I just made a hobby out of it."

Weiert's collection now contains 17 pieces, ranging from the original zebra head to the bust of a gorilla and the entirety of a small turtle sitting on a log.

"The turtle I originally did as a kind of joke," Weiert said. "My son was always saying he wanted a turtle. So one day I had some leftover chicken wire that I decided to make into a turtle for my son," he said.

"He didn't like it. He still comes in and says 'Daddy, I hate your animals'."

Fortunately, though, most people who have seen his art don't feel this way.

"Whenever I've shown them, I've gotten great responses," Weiert said. "Everyone likes to look at them, and they think the heads are unique. They usually take a card, and I've even had people ask me if I'll do commission work."

Weiert said that would be ideal.

"Ultimately, I'd love to make a living as an artist, to work at home and have lots of time to spend with my family," he said. "But there are never any guarantees. That's why you stay in school and get a degree."

Weiert, a Wamego native, said he has always

NATO to impose blockade in Yugoslavia

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BRUSSELS, Belgium — NATO agreed Wednesday to impose a naval blockade on Yugoslavia under a U.N. effort to intensify pressure on Belgrade to halt ethnic fighting in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

Romania announced it had begun stopping boats on the Danube River to check for contraband cargos under a new Security Council resolution allowing the use of force to block such shipments.

The new U.N. effort is designed to cut off goods and fuel that have been getting through to Yugoslavia despite 6-month-old trade sanctions. Serbia's help for Serb militants in Bosnia is widely blamed for the war that erupted after Bosnia's majority Muslims and Croats voted for independence on Feb. 29.

In other developments:

■ U.N. officials reported an outbreak of typhoid fever in Bosnia. They said the source appeared to be a contaminated spring in Jajce, a town thousands of people fled after heavy fighting last month. Doctors have confirmed 25 cases among refugees, but many cases probably have been missed, the report said.

■ Sarajevo, Bosnia's capital, was relatively quiet on the seventh day of a tenuous cease-fire, but many areas of the city did not have water or electricity.

■ U.N. relief officials took advantage of the relative calm to open supply routes to Sarajevo and nearby cities. Several hundred people left the capital by bus.

■ Former Presidents Reagan and Ford and ex-British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher issued a statement warning that fighting in Bosnia could spark a wider war in the Balkans. Turkey Defense Minister Nevzat Ajaz made a similar warning, citing the problem of ethnic groups that overlap borders.

The 16 NATO allies announced they would cooperate with the Western European Union in jointly policing the Adriatic Sea to keep ships from breaking the U.N. ban on trade with Yugoslavia, which is now only Serbia and Montenegro.

CAMPUS

Kick-off rally promotes Homecoming

LANA SCHRATER
Collegian

The sounds of the "Wabash Cannonball" rang through the K-State Union Wednesday as the K-State Marching Band helped kick off Homecoming 1992.

"The Homecoming Kick-Off Rally is to draw awareness to voting for Ambassador candidates and to involve the entire campus in Homecoming," said Doug Reid, senior in electrical and computer engineering.

"Voice of the Wildcats" Mitch Holthus emceed the Union Program Council-sponsored event at noon Wednesday in the Union Courtyard.

Football coach Bill Snyder said the season has been disappointing, but the team, especially the seniors, is motivated for Saturday's game against Oklahoma State.

The eight candidates for K-State Ambassador were introduced for the first time at the rally.

The Ultralites Dance-Step Team, a multi-cultural troupe, performed a dance they had been working on this semester, Reid said.

"They contacted us," Reid said. "We wanted to show a different view of how different groups show enthusiasm for K-State."

Cheerleaders and yell leaders, Willie the Wildcat and the K-State Pep Band also performed at the rally.

After the rally, Holthus asked students to stick around to be part of a videotape the athletic department is producing.

"The video is a fun message to tell grade schoolers to feel good about themselves and school," said Patsy Brandt, academic counselor for the athletic department.

The video is in response to calls requesting coaches and athletes for speaking engagements, many too far away for them to attend.

Due to the lack of space in the Union, Homecoming events, such as body building, have been moved to Ahearn Field House, said John Niemann, K-State ambassador and senior in agribusiness.

By the Collegian Editorial Board

No pardons for scandal players

THE ISSUE

President Bush is being urged to grant pardons to all involved in the Iran-Contra affair.

WE SUGGEST

The wheels of justice should turn. If they are guilty, these people should be punished.

It seems that President Bush wants to tie up the loose ends before he vacates the White House in January.

After what has been an endless and bungled investigation into the Iran-Contra affair, a number of Republicans in his administration and on Capitol Hill are pushing for a special pardon.

This pardon, of course, would be for Caspar Weinberger, President Reagan's defense secretary, who probably had a large role in the affair.

Senate Minority Leader Bob Dole would take it a step further. He wants pardons for everyone charged with Iran-Contra wrongdoing. Add to that a special investigation of special counsel Lawrence Walsh, who is prosecuting those charged.

The investigation of Walsh is certainly necessary. Evidence of cover-ups, illegal expenditures and shoddy bookkeeping warrant this.

But pardoning the players before all the calls are in is completely absurd.

It is obvious that severe legal infractions occurred in the Reagan administration. Bush would further stain his already questionable reputation by arbitrarily sweeping the whole matter under the rug.

It's time to find counsel who will cut to the heart of the matter — someone who will reveal the truth, which seems to be severely lacking lately.

A pardon should be a means of justice when the regular legal process has failed. But in Iran-Contra, the process hasn't even had a chance.

What I didn't know about fee is now quite clear

I hope the increase in the Athletic Fee approved by the Student Senate has the effect Senate intended. If it doesn't, I also hope a lot of student senators find themselves with free Thursday evenings next year.

When I decided to oppose the increase two weeks ago, I didn't anticipate the flood of gratitude I would receive from students who were concerned about the way their money is spent. Most of the students who have expressed their opinions to me do not appreciate being taxed through their fees to support a for-profit business, just because they are students.

When I wrote about the fee increase, I was relatively uninformed. I knew in my gut that it felt wrong, but I didn't know why.

I didn't know that the sole source of funding for the K-State Marching Band was the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics. And I didn't know that during the past 10 years, the band's funding has gone down while the Athletic Fee has gone up.

I didn't know that the Athletic Fee was requested by the athletic department several years ago during a financial crisis. When the student body defeated the fee in a referendum, season ticket prices nearly doubled. The next year, the Athletic Fee was initiated. Ticket prices did not go back down.

I didn't know that sports clubs were funded so poorly by Senate that they would feel compelled to seek assistance from the athletic department. Or that the athletic department would encourage them to straight-arm some extra funding.

I didn't know that the Athletic Fee was such a small part — less than five percent — of the athletic department's multi-million dollar budget. The students' contribution is like a single bright star falling into the black hole of the department's multi-million dollar debt.

I didn't know that Athletic Fee increases, consistently supported by Senate's majority, have been defeated on two previous occasions in votes by the student body.

And I didn't know that Senate's majority was so firmly under the thumb of the tag-team of Fred Wingert and Milt Richards. Richards said he thought the Senate majority favored the bill all along. It is clear they did.

In supporting the bill, however, those senators ignored the majority of the students. By the Senate's own survey, more than two-thirds of student respondents opposed the increase. By my own tally, I'd say the percentage was even higher.

By nearly a two-thirds margin, Senate defeated an amendment to the bill that would have made the increase subject to a referendum by the students. With this action, the senators voting in favor of the increase made it clear that they didn't care what the students thought.

There are a lot of senators who think their position makes them qualified to make decisions without student input. "What gives the average student the knowledge that we have?" demanded Sen. Darby Wallace during the debate.

These senators have much to learn. By passing the Athletic Fee increase, they have renounced their right to control how students' money is spent. Instead of passing separate bills to guarantee the funding of the band and sports clubs, they have left the fate of these programs to the debt-ridden athletic department. I truly hope the Athletic Fee carries through on its promise to fund the band and sports clubs.

As for the Student Senate, I commend those senators with enough sense to question the fee increase. Unfortunately, if the Athletic Fee fails in its purposes, you too will be branded with the others as being party to ignoring the will of the student body.

Athletics may play a role in the reputation of a university, but so does good sense. If this fee is a failure, then I hope this Senate gains a reputation as the "Athletic Student Senate," a term that needs no acronym.

TOLES

OTHER VIEWPOINTS

There was no the turnover in Congress that many frustrated voters would like to have seen, but the freshmen who will take seats in January have their priorities straight.

A survey by the Associated Press shows freshmen members of Congress said that giving the economy a shove is the number one priority.

So, if jobs is the number one priority, what are numbers two and three? Jobs and jobs.

In fact, to quote the most important political axiom that guided Democrat Bill Clinton to success: "It's about the economy, stupid." Candidates who understood that won. Candidates who didn't lost.

Now comes the hard part of actually doing something about it. Freshmen members of Congress even are talking about, if you can believe this, not working for pork-barrel projects for their districts and cutting their staffs. And, get this: Some are even talking term limits.

Some Congressional reform would be nice, but they must keep their eyes on the ball. They should repeat it every day, right after the prayer and the pledge. "It's about the economy, stupid."

The new members of Congress got the message from voters. We hope the older ones did, too.

— The Clarion Ledger, Jackson, Miss.

Did you wonder what the Democrats meant during the campaign when they urged Bill Clinton's election so they could eliminate "gridlock?"

They said they meant a Congress and president of the same party so they could get things done, move the country forward, pull the economy up by its bootstraps, all that sort of thing.

What they really meant was more likely the sort of thing Congress did the other day: ordering the Pentagon to spend $15 million to help build a cruise ship that the Pentagon doesn't need, just so shipyards in certain congressional districts will have work to do.

Mind you, this isn't even a military ship, and it isn't even for American use. The vessel, twice the size of any current passenger liner, would be built for a European firm. The feeble argument that it could be used to ferry U.S. troops in wartime doesn't float, because the military moves by air these days.

Four years of greased skids instead of "gridlock." We can hardly wait.

EVALUATIONS

Column brings good points to attention

Editor,
Despite the headline, Maarten Van Swaay's guest column in the Nov. 13 Collegian did not remove all the confusion surrounding evaluations. It did something more important by raising issues worthy of consideration.

The concern I have regarding late-semester evaluations that come too late for any improvements in the class may be balanced by the value these evaluations have for future classes. Late evaluations also benefit the student, who will have gained an increased understanding of the course objectives and teaching methods used.

Suggestions can be made at any time.

Professor Van Swaay made a persuasive case that signed comments are likely to be more thoughtful and responsible than anonymous check marks. On the whole, I have found students have treated the anonymous evaluations seriously. I have welcomed criticism of classroom procedures, and in response to comments, I have refined them over time. In instances where I believe I have valid reasons for unpopular policies, I will persist.

In small classes, the signing of many evaluations would make the identification of unsigned comments easy. For that reason, I favor uniformity regarding the use or absence of signatures.

While it is correct that the evaluation forms were not intended as a tool to support salary and promotion decisions, they certainly are used for that purpose. The evaluation of faculty by students is important and deserves further attention and debate.

VETERAN'S DAY

School should close to honor veterans

Editor,
America observed Veteran's Day Nov. 11 as a national holiday. K-State did not.

Banks were closed. The mail was not delivered, but K-State was "business as usual." It doesn't seem fair or respectful to the service men and women who risked their lives for our country, especially when a great number of K-State students are in the armed forces. I have friends who go to school in Miami. Even though class time was lost due to Hurricane Andrew, the schools still closed in observance of Veteran's Day.

Fort Riley is one of the largest Army bases in the nation. I think K-State should have more respect for its neighbors in the future. Next week, we have three days off for Thanksgiving. My friends fought in Desert Storm. My father fought in Vietnam. My grandfather fought in World War II. I don't know anyone from Plymouth Rock.

ATHLETIC FEE

Athletics get money; programs still suffer

Editor,
I was upset to hear the Athletic Fee hike passed in Student Senate. I am a student in speech pathology and audiology. I am fighting to keep my program in existence. I'd much rather put the $17 I will be paying to the athletic department to my program instead.

What I don't understand is, if, according to Milt Richards, the athletic department can get the money through the KSU Foundation, then why are students being forced to pay even more money that is not going toward tuition?

Fred Wingert said that if they don't get the money, it would hurt the University's image. I think cutting a professional program (i.e. speech pathology) that is in great demand and pays back to the state hurts the University's image.

I came to K-State to get an education, not to financially support athletics.

MORE ATHLETIC FEE

Editorial lost count of the vote margin

Editor,
The Collegian Editorial Board opinion Nov. 18 regarding the Student Senate vote on the Athletic Fee increase inaccurately stated the bill "barely passed."

After a six-hour debate, the vote was 39 in favor, 16 opposed, no abstentions and two absent. To pass, the bill needed a two-thirds majority, which it received. I would characterize 70 percent in favor as being more than a "narrow margin."

I have no objections with your call for a referendum, but I do think your characterization of the vote should more closely reflect the reality of what happened.

ABORTION

Generalization of pro-choicers wrong

Editor,
I am not quite sure what Scott Spradlin was trying to say in "Empty chants carry pro-choice view."

If his intent was to show the ugly side of the abortion issue, then why have we not seen him comment on the horrible way many pro-life groups harass women outside of women's health clinics? Or the harassment of doctors who work there? His intent seemed much more to be the categorization of all pro-choice individuals as name-calling atheists. And that generalization was way out of line.

Like most people, I have thought deeply about the abortion issue and come to believe that it is in our country's best interests not to make laws that control a woman's body. Although I disagree with the "lifers" point of view, I in no way condone the physical abuse of any person because of their moral or political beliefs.

If Mr. Spradlin assumes all pro-choice advocates are in the same category as the Chicago group, it would be similar to my assumption that he approves of the terroristic strategies used by many pro-life groups. I guess then that it's fair to ask, how many abortion clinics have you bombed lately, Scott?

2 students involved in minor accident

DEBORAH WHITSON

A two-car, non-injury accident occurred at 1:45 p.m. Wednesday at North Manhattan Avenue and Old Claflin Road.

Michael Ables, sophomore in biology education, was traveling south on Manhattan when Cole Stanley, graduate student in student counseling and personal services, turned across the lane in front of him.

Stanley had been traveling north on Manhattan and was attempting to turn on to the street in front of Ford Hall.

Ables, driving a silver Pontiac Fiero, braked and attempted to swerve right to avoid hitting Stanley, who was driving a Pontiac Grand Am.

Stanley's car caught the Fiero's left front side and dragged it until both cars came to a halt at the southwest corner of the intersection.

Ables could drive his car out of the intersection, but Stanley's car had to be towed from the scene. Damage to the front of Stanley's car split the radiator, causing antifreeze and steam to escape.

Firefighters were called to the scene, because the steam was first thought to be an engine fire.

"He turned in front of me into my lane," Ables said. "I tried to swerve to avoid hitting him, but I didn't have time. I didn't know if he saw me."

Stanley said he hadn't seen Ables' car when he began his turn.

Officer Connie Miller, with the Riley County Police Department, said she didn't think Stanley had seen Ables.

"This is a heavily traveled intersection," Miller said. "I can see how that would happen, with all the pedestrian traffic and the cars."

She said the misty weather combined with the Fiero's color may have been a factor in the accident, but not necessarily the cause.

Stanley was cited for failure to yield the right of way while turning left.

Women elected in record numbers

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MONTPELIER, Vt. — Women will be represented in record numbers in state Legislatures across the country, giving them the opportunity to change governmental priorities with every new seat.

"Women tend to focus on issues that affect women's lives, children's lives, families' lives," said Lucy Baruch, information director for the Center for the American Woman and Politics at Rutgers University.

"They bring to the table a different political agenda."

As a result of the November election, women will constitute a record 20 percent of state legislators in 1993, up from 5 percent in 1971 and 18 percent this year, the center said.

More than 60 percent of them are Democrats;

Packing material may soon be edible. Researchers in Shellenberger Hall have been working with grain starches to create a protective loose fill, commonly known as packing peanuts.

The starch is formed and shaped into the spongy peanuts through an extrusion process. It can easily be recycled as a feed component for livestock or as fermentation stock.

Paul Neumann, grain sciences research associate, said it has been researched for a year and a half. Many people have used popcorn as an environmentally safe alternative to packing material, but rodents and insects are attracted to it.

Neumann said the packing peanuts being researched do not attract pests, because they are solely made of corn and wheat starch, and have no flavor or odor.

"There's nothing in them that's bad for you, but there's no flavor and nothing to them. They're just bland," Neumann said. "Starch is purified from the grain and has no odor. You really can't survive on it just by itself."

Neumann said he has warmed them and tried them with strawberry jam.

He said he also is researching foam

Absolutely Wrong. Any kind of spark or flame near a gas leak could be hazardous, not just to your health, but to your neighborhood as well. Clear the area, call KPL, and we'll come investigate.

Wrong again. If gas has leaked into your home, the spark in a light switch could cause a problem. Don't look for the trouble; that's our job. Clear out and call KPL.

Wrong. Even the low-voltage of a telephone switch could be dangerous if gas has leaked in your home. Go to a neighbor's home and call KPL to report any gas leak.

RIGHT! If you ever smell the telltale "rotten eggs" odor we add to our natural gas, get everyone out of the house and call us from a neighbor's phone.

Snyder is more than a coach

Wins and losses.

All too often, coaches are measured by how many marks are in the win column compared to the loss column.

Have they beaten the rival or not? How many players from the program find themselves in the pros?

These factors determine whether a coach is successful. Foolish — totally foolish.

With two games remaining on the Wildcats' schedule, I'm still unable to decide which personality K-State has. Frankly, the Cats have played like Sybil's cousin. You can choose which one.

But through the quagmire of disgust, frustration and aggravation, this University has much to be proud of.

And at the top of the list is the football program's head honcho — Bill Snyder. A gentleman, humanitarian and one hell of a coach. I wish I could play for him and his staff.

You can forget all his individual awards. He'd give them all back in a heartbeat. Whether it was for his team or his family, Coach Snyder would forgo all his accolades for a winning season.

Considering the hodgepodge of scenarios facing Snyder and the Cats prior to the season, the reality of the 1992 season burns.

Even in worst nightmares, you can bet Coach Snyder, or anyone else for that matter, figured things could have turned out this way. And in no way, shape or form is he pleased with a 4-5 record. Far from it.

Coaching and being a college student are a lot alike. You have to cope and put up with a bunch of crap.

This is some of what faced Coach Snyder prior to the season. He had to find a new quarterback, and his expectations could not get the best of him.

His top running back had blown a knee and wasn't expected to be ready until October.

The defensive secondary had holes to fill and, with other conference members switching to passing attacks, concern was prevalent.

None of that compares to what he and his family faced earlier this year — a serious car accident that nearly killed his daughter, Meredith.

When something tragic like that occurs, it would be easy to chuck the whole ball of wax.

Coach Snyder didn't. In fact, he probably worked harder than ever.

He is a man who doesn't seek attention. He shuns it but takes 100 percent of the responsibility when things go awry. He'll tell you he should because he's the coach.

He never blames anyone for failing — they just had a bad game. He doesn't take the credit for winning — it's the players who should be rewarded.

He is the mastermind of K-State football. Bill Snyder is caring, personable and more than just a coach. The awards simply symbolize a fraction of the work he's done at K-State.

Bill Snyder has brought respect and enthusiasm back to this University at a time it was desperately needed.

It may not be an Orange Bowl year or a Cereal Bowl year for the Wildcats, but K-State has a coach you can't knock down. Bill Snyder is a prototype coach, and K-State ought to count its blessings.

Wildcat artillery buries Tankers

STEVE ROCK

Collegian

K-State's 92-77 exhibition-game victory Wednesday night over the Fort Hood AAU Tankers provided 4,518 fans a flash of the old and a look at the new.

First, the Wildcats of old.

Junior guard Askia Jones, last year's leading scorer, led the team with 28 points. He connected on five of seven 3-pointers and was 10 for 13 from the field.

Jones scored more points than he scored in all but two games last year. And all in just 24 minutes.

"I'm happy," Jones said matter-of-factly.

Another name from the past is senior Vincent Jackson.

One of two returning seniors for the Cats, Jackson got out of the box early. He had a pair of steals and six points just six minutes into the contest.

"I really came out ready to play," Jackson said. "My goal is to come out and play my hardest."

Another returning Wildcat, junior forward Deryl Cunningham, made six of nine shots and scored a career-high 14 points. Cunningham also had seven rebounds, tied for tops on the team.

And then there's the new.

Junior point guard Anthony Beane took the first step in alleviating fears that the Cats would sorely miss Marcus Zeigler. The transfer from Three Rivers Community College directed the Cat offense for much of the game.

And although Beane led the team with 27 minutes played and dished out a team-high six assists, Wildcat coach Dana Altman said he's seen Beane play better.

"Anthony played all right," Altman said. "Anthony's had some better practices. He has shot the ball better in practice, and he's probably disappointed with his shooting tonight."

Beane scored just four points, making two of his nine shots. But he said the Cats as a whole played a good game.

"I think we showed that we have a lot of guts and heart," he said. "We're going to get better as the season goes along. When we get more practice, we're going to be a team to be reckoned with."

In all, the Wildcat newcomers, including freshman center Jerrell Roberson, junior forward Ron Lucas, freshman guard Brian Gavin and redshirt freshman George Hill, scored 15 points.

"I saw some new players step up and handle their first time out all right," Altman said.

One of Altman's concerns was the team's 24 turnovers.

"We turned the ball over too many times," he said. "That was the most disappointing thing."

The 1992 Wildcats, Jackson said, are a far cry from last year's 16-14 team.

"Top to bottom, this is a new team," he said. "Last year, we had a lot of offensive players. This year, we've got a lot of guys who think defense first, trying to make plays for other players."

MAJOR LEAGUE BASEBALL

Pirates' Bonds named MVP

Left fielder beats out Pendleton, Sheffield for 2nd MVP in 3 years

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Barry Bonds' value as a free agent went up a little Wednesday after he was named the National League Most Valuable Player for the second time in three years.

Bonds was an easy winner over Atlanta's Terry Pendleton, receiving 18 of a possible 24 first-place votes in balloting by the Baseball Writers Association of America.

Bonds finished with 304 points, followed by Pendleton with 232 points, including four first-place votes, and San Diego's Gary Sheffield with two first-place votes and 204 points.

"I think this is probably the most important one, because this one I'm giving to my mom. She deserves it," Bonds said.

He led the Pittsburgh Pirates to their third straight NL East title by hitting .311 with 34 homers and 103 RBIs. He also scored 109 runs and walked 127 times.

The left fielder also won the MVP award in 1990 and was runner-up to Pendleton last year. He is the 10th player to win more than one NL MVP, joining such Hall of Famers as Stan Musial, Willie Mays and Ernie Banks.

"I have a lot of reactions," Bonds said. "Last year, statistically, I thought I had a shot. I was very happy for Terry Pendleton. He's a good friend of mine."

For winning MVP honors, Bonds gets a $250,000 bonus from the Pirates. That raised his 1992 income to $5.05 million, including bonuses.

"I never set goals for myself," Bonds said. "I prepare the same way every year. I would do the same things if you paid me $1."

After the All-Star break, Bonds hit .319 with 19 homers and 54 RBIs.

He became the first Pirate since Willie Stargell (1971-73) to drive in 100 runs for three straight seasons. Bonds' 34 homers represented a career high.

Sheffield surprised just about everyone by hitting .330 with 33 home runs and 100 RBIs. He was acquired from Milwaukee just before the start of the season.

"I'm happy for Barry as a friend," Sheffield said. "I thought it was quite an accomplishment."

Sheffield said he was disappointed, though.

"If I didn't win the batting title, I'd have no second thoughts," he said. "But I won that, not to mention 100 RBIs and 33 home runs. That's something in the modern day that doesn't happen. That's something that usually happens in other times."

Pendleton led the Braves to their second straight NL pennant, hitting .311 with 21 homers and 105 RBIs. The third baseman gets a $75,000 bonus for his second-place finish.

Following Sheffield in the voting were Pittsburgh's Andy Van Slyke (145) and Montreal's Larry Walker (111). For finishing fourth, Van Slyke will get a $100,000 raise in 1993.

SPORTS DIGEST

► HUSKERS ROUT CATS

The K-State volleyball team's last road game ended in a loss to Nebraska.

The nationally ranked Huskers beat the Wildcats in three games, 15-2, 15-6, 15-7. Nebraska dominated in all categories, improving to a season record of 19-4, while K-State fell to 7-21 for the year.

Nebraska finished with 47 kills and a .398 percentage.

The Cats close their season with a game against the Colorado Lady Buffs at 7:30 p.m. Saturday in Ahearn Field House.

► CHIEFS RE-SIGN SMITH

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — The Kansas City Chiefs have added wide receiver Michael Smith, a former Wildcat, to their practice squad.

The team said Wednesday that Smith was re-signed after being released from the squad last week.

Before his release, Smith had been a member of the squad since Sept. 16.

Last year, Smith was named first-team all-Big Eight as he became K-State's all-time leader in receptions and receiving yards.

► CLONES WIN OPENER

AMES, Iowa — Julius Michalik scored a career-high 24 points and helped No. 19 Iowa State pull away in the second half for an 84-69 victory over Indiana State in the preseason NIT Wednesday night.

Iowa State won its fourth straight season opener and will play at No. 9 Florida State in a second-round game Friday night. Florida State advanced with an 89-80 victory over Siena.

Justus Thigpen added 19 points for Iowa State.

► NO PRACTICE FOR OU

NORMAN, Okla. — The Oklahoma football team did not have a scheduled practice Wednesday as players aired grievances to the coaching staff.

The meeting was attended by a majority of the team and several coaches, including head coach Gary Gibbs.

There has been speculation that some players are disenchanted with the fact that Steve Collins did not start at quarterback last weekend in a 15-15 tie with Oklahoma State. Impressive in beating Missouri 51-17.

Union features country music

KIM MCINTY

Union Station will have a different sound tonight.

The Flatt Landers, a contemporary country music band, will perform at 9 p.m. The evening will also include a country dance contest at intermission.

The entertainment is part of the Eclectic Revue, sponsored by the Union Program Council.

"The campus seems to be really segmented. So, we're trying to bring more of the north side to the south side," said Ernie Fields, Eclectic Entertainment Committee Chairman.

"We've never had a country band here before. We're looking forward to it," he said. "We usually have alternative-type music."

The Flatt Landers are a five-piece band featuring Shelly Delaney, lead vocalist, and Steve Strong, lead guitarist and vocalist.

Delaney and Strong moved to Kansas four years ago from California. They assembled a band six months ago to produce a self-titled album, and the group is currently working on a second album to be released at the beginning of the year.

The artists have played at several local nightclubs, county fairs and the State Fair. They have also opened for country stars such as Mel McDaniels and Becky Hobbs.

"We've enjoyed playing country music in Kansas to an appreciative audience," Strong said. "We're looking forward to doing that again Thursday night."

There will also be a dance contest, with prizes for first, second and third places. First place will receive a $50 gift certificate from S-Bar-J Western Clothiers.

Contest judges will be from various businesses such as S-Bar-J, Fields said.

"Flatt Landers seems to have a pretty good following locally," Fields said. He said the group played at K-State at the end of the summer and received a good response.

THEATER

A Frenchman in America

Graduate assistant directs Broadway comedy 'The Foreigner'

ERIN BURKE

Collegian

"The Foreigner" is in town. Manhattan Civic Theatre is presenting this Broadway comedy a second time this weekend. It opened last Friday.

The play, written by Larry Shue, is a comedy about a shy and troubled young Frenchman who accompanies his friend to America.

While living in a small, rural southern town, he digresses even further into his socially introverted state. In order to avoid explaining his reclusive behavior, the friend tells the locals the Frenchman speaks no English.

As a result, townspeople begin divulging intimate facts about themselves, thinking the foreigner doesn't understand a word. What was previously a problem now helps him rectify troublesome situations for the people who confide in him, and in turn, he gains confidence to become a new person.

"Even though it is a comedy, there is some legitimate drama intent that leads to the play's climax," said Richard Hobbs, graduate teaching assistant in English and director of "The Foreigner."

"To me, a good play is a good play, and this is a good play," Hobbs said.

Comedies should make the audience laugh; dramas should make them think and feel, Hobbs said. The audience expects this from a certain type of play.

Seven people make up the cast. Many talented people auditioned, but the final decision was based on how they related to each other, Hobbs said.

"Everyone gets along beautifully, and it reflects on stage," Hobbs said.

The cast began practicing a little over a month ago and has been great to work with, Hobbs said. The performances last week went very smoothly, and there was a sizable crowd.

Being new to the area, this is the first play Hobbs has directed for Manhattan Civic Theatre, a non-profit organization that has existed for 27 years. The theater organization usually has four to five productions a year.

"The Foreigner" is the last production for this year, with the next scheduled for February, said Edith Hinrichs, executive director of Manhattan Civic Theatre.

SHOWTIMES

"The Foreigner" will be presented at 8 p.m. Friday and Saturday, and at 2 p.m. Sunday at Wareham Opera House. Tickets are $8, $7 and $4 and are available at the Wareham Box Office. Call 539-6000 from 11 a.m.-3 p.m., Monday-Friday for more information.

synthetic materials is forcing companies to seek packaging alternatives, and plastic packaging may soon be a thing of the past, said Tom Herald, assistant professor of foods and nutrition.

"The Kansas Value Added Center came to us with companies that wanted more products developed from their specific commodity," he said.

Herald and his assistants have been working for the last six months on an edible film made from wheat gluten. The film is expected to extend shelf life of food by decreasing the rate of oxidation, which causes spoilage.

Films will vary by thickness, color and possibly even flavor.

Herald said the thicker films could be used as garbage bags, and the thinner films could be used in place of the plastic wraps that are used on vegetables and fruits in the stores.

Neumann said the research is basically through for the packing peanuts, and they are just waiting for a company to come in and license the patents.

COLLEGIAN IN FOCUS

NOVEMBER 19, 1992

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

BELOW: A bison is restrained by a nose ring and a rope around its horns as a veterinarian draws a blood sample. RIGHT: It takes several adults to hold the bison still while the veterinarian does his work.

BRINGING IN THE BISON

Standing on a catwalk above a holding pen stuffed with bison, poking their thick hides with a pole in hopes of goading them into movement, you learn just how massive bison are.

And how stubborn.

Making about 140 bison go where they didn't want to go was the job of Konza Prairie Research Natural Area managers Thursday and Friday at the annual Konza Prairie bison roundup.

Konza Prairie is a 8,616-acre tract of tallgrass prairie, complete with bison, managed by the K-State Division of Biology for research purposes.

Konza staff first began luring the bison into the corral a few weeks ago, said David Hartnett, roundup organizer and professor of biology. At this time of year, the prairie grasses have begun to dry up, and the bison are easily drawn in with food pellets, he said.

Baiting is the only way to bring bison in, because the terrain is too rough to drive them in with trucks or horses.

"They don't respect horses, anyway," Hartnett said.

The bison corral is a sturdy structure built of surplus boxcar steel sunk in concrete.

A tractor is used to drive groups of bison into a corridor, where they take a sharp right turn into two holding pens. Here, they are broken up in manageable groups.

After being sorted, the bison end up in a circular pen with a rotating gate that is used to force them into a narrow opening of the squeeze chute.

True to its name, the squeeze chute has sides which are tightened to immobilize the bison so that it can be approached.

The trick in all of it is making the bison move at all.

"Sometimes one gets stubborn and won't move and holds up the show. You can't make them move," Hartnett said.

Five bison refused to enter the squeeze chute, ignoring any amount of poking, shouting and even the use of electric prods. They had to be released without being checked.

It takes about 15 people to run the roundup necessary for routine maintenance, tests and immunizations — the same ones cattle go through, Hartnett said.

"Our basic objective was to blood test the bison for brucellosis this year," said Jerome Vestweber, herd veterinarian and professor of large animal medicine.

Brucellosis is a serious disease which causes reproductive disorders and is very infectious, Vestweber said. It can be transmitted by deer or cattle.

"It has been a problem in bison elsewhere," Vestweber said. "We are essentially doing preventive blood testing to ensure it doesn't become a problem."

And just when the bison thought it was all over, some had to be freeze-branded.

Ken Larkins, senior in wildlife biology, carried out the task, which involves using brands chilled in liquid nitrogen.

Weilert is trying to find a market for Humane Heads.

He said he has an artist friend with a representative in Washington who is looking for a place where the heads will sell.

"I've got a catchy idea with Humane Heads," Weilert said.

To one shop owner, Clinton talked about the need for banks to make more credit available. "It's the quickest way to generate more jobs in America," he said.

"We've got some plans, and we're going to put them in, and I think Congress will go along," Clinton said.

He will go to Capitol Hill today for bipartisan meetings with Senate and House leaders.

Congress holds the key to success for Clinton's ambitious agenda of economic proposals and other measures, and he was eager to begin the relationship on the right foot.

After Clinton arrived at the White House, he and Bush smiled and shook hands for the cameras at the Rose Garden but declined to answer questions.

They met in the Oval Office, one on one, for an hour and 45 minutes.

Clinton said Bush was helpful.

"We talked about a couple of domestic issues and more than a dozen actual or potential trouble spots in the world," he said. "He gave me the benefit of his thinking on a lot of things. It went a half-hour longer than expected."

After their private talks, Clinton and Bush went next door to the Roosevelt Room, where transition leaders for each man were meeting.

Women make their mark

38.5 percent are Republicans.

Washington leads the nation with 38 percent of its legislators being female. Kansas was No. 8.

Washington also elected women to one of two U.S. Senate seats, three of nine U.S. House seats and four of nine elected executive offices.

"The state of Washington is in a state of euphoria," said Ruth Mandel, the center's director. "It will be very interesting ... to see if it makes any significant difference in the political process."

The center's research from the late 1980s — when women represented 17 percent of state lawmakers — showed that women legislators do more for women and are more likely to conduct government business openly.

"They are more collaborative," said Sara Gear, the Vermont House

Republican leader who won a state Senate seat.

"They don't seem to have the male ego problem that some, not all, men seem to have," she said. "I think that's the basis of compromise: trying to find the solution rather than holding out for their own particular solution."

Konza home to buffalo

"The branding process kills pigment cells in the hairs, causing them to turn white," he said.

"It's supposed to be less painful than heat branding."

Prior to this year, ear tags were used to identify the bison.

"Our intentions are, if this works right, we'd like to get them all freeze-branded," Larkins said.

Bison have been a part of Konza Prairie since October 1987, when about 30 bison were donated by the Fort Riley U.S. Cavalry Museum.

Later, the biology division purchased more from different backgrounds to increase genetic diversity, Hartnett said.

The herd size is now about 142 bison on about 2,500 acres of Konza, enclosed by a 10-foot electric fence.

And the bison on the Konza have a purpose.

"One of our goals is to approximate pre-settlement native tallgrass prairie and to preserve the biological diversity of the tallgrass prairie.

"Another reason is to conduct research to understand the structure and function of tallgrass prairie and the effect of the bison on it," Hartnett said.

As the last group of bison thundered out of the corral into the prairie grasses, it seemed that there were other, less tangible reasons for being there.

Education key to relations

ROY GRABER
Collegian

University faculty from across the nation discussed campus race issues with about 50 K-Staters via satellite Wednesday afternoon.

The program, presented by Union Program Council, was carried simultaneously on other campuses nationwide.

K-State participants watched the program on a big screen in the K-State Union Ballroom.

Faculty members from the University of Maryland, North Carolina State University, the University of Colorado and the University of California discussed issues of racial misunderstanding and some solutions.

Ronald Takaki, professor of ethnic, Asian and American studies at the University of California, said he believed one of the best routes to racial harmony is through instruction.

"We need to focus on curriculum," Takaki said. "How do we work it out unless we understand each other?"

Moderator Julian Bond said students can improve racial harmony through involvement, daily sensitivity, effort and awareness.

Faculty members can set examples by organizing discussions and sending clear messages about racial relations.

Bond concluded the discussion by saying that to solve problems of ethnic misunderstanding, everyone needs to look at solutions directly related to them.

UPC officials said they were pleased with the message and its effect.

"We learned about it from an ad in a copy of a chronicle of higher-education organizations," UPC program director Ann Claussen said.

"I think in student organizations it is important to discuss the issues. We don't consider ourselves experts, but we are a vehicle," she said.

UPC adviser Charla Bailey said she thought this would increase awareness of racial problems.

"I think a lot of what we needed to do was to get some awareness out," Bailey said. "This enabled K-State as well as other campuses to learn these tactics."

UNIVERSITY

Joint economic project wins 3rd

JILL SCHRAG
Collegian

The Kansas Center for Community Economic Development won a third-place Project of the Year Award for its economic development program.

The center, formed by K-State and the University of Kansas, was among 10 U.S. universities to receive the award from the National Association of Management and Technical Assistance Centers. NAMTAC judged programs on quality, innovation and effectiveness.

KU and K-State's cooperation made the team a contender, said Marvin Kaiser, associate dean of Arts and Sciences and KCCED co-director.

"Strategic community planning isn't widespread yet," he said. "Kansas has given real leadership in this area. We've tried to get to the grassroots and develop local leadership. It's not flashy in some ways, but if you do it right, local people decide. 'If this is going to be a good place to live, we have to be in charge and make it happen.'"

Genna Ott, assistant director of KCCED at KU, said before 1988, Kansas had only three strategic community plans.

Since the Community Strategic Planning Assistance Act was passed in the Kansas Legislature in 1988, 38 counties have completed plans, and 29 are in the process of creating plans.

"We reach out throughout the whole state," Ott said. "Many centers deal with specific businesses or regions, but Kansas is unique in that we work with community leaders, not just business leaders."

Strategic planning began in Kansas in response to the farm crisis and the loss of population as young people left the state, Ott said. But, she said she thinks the economy is improving.

"Before, we always lagged behind the rest of the United States, but in the last couple of years, we've been keeping up with national averages," she said.

Kaiser said the center is a liaison between communities and their resources.

"We help communities identify resources, either from university faculty or other organizations, to work with them in planning their own economic development," he said.

The center helps the Kansas Department of Commerce and Housing divide state funds for community economic planning among different counties.

Kaiser said the center's demographic data are important for communities in the planning stages.

"To figure out where you want to go, you need to know where you are," Kaiser said.

He said the center's emphasis on youth in service and entrepreneurship is a strength, too. "We're trying to have young people invest in community, so they feel like they're involved, because young Kansans are leaving after graduation, and they're not coming back," Kaiser said.

■ K-State and KU formed the Kansas Center for Community Economic Development five years ago.

■ Kansas is the only state with two major universities working jointly at a university center.

■ The next community economic development conference will be April 24-25 in Great Bend.

of the general business degree. "We met with Dean Short and asked about the general business degree, and he said that there is no longer a market for it," Janke said.

"If it is not going to do you any good, then why offer it?" Clayton Wheeler, sophomore in business administration and Senate representative, said this move will call for students to get a more specific education.

"All it takes is another credit to specialize," Wheeler said. "This will get general business majors to focus on a specialized major, and that is what people are looking for."

The college has also proposed eliminating the master's of business administration program at K-State-Salina, Short said.

"It's well-received but very expensive," he said. "We found that it was too expensive to continue."

Cutting one associate dean position has also been proposed, though Short said these people are needed.

"The decision is unfortunate by budget restraints," Short said. "We felt in the dean's department that we had to be the first to be cut."

Short said the college has an honors program, but it needs to create a more challenging curriculum.

"We would also like to have professionals come in to interact with the students," he said.

The emphasis in professional skills, he said, creates more opportunity for study in and out of the classroom.

Short said part of the educational process is hands-on experience, and the ability to analyze problems and use skills.

The college emphasizes curriculum for undergraduates to develop these skills, he said.

"We want an ongoing process, because the curriculum is in a constant state of revision," Short said.

For the first time, the college will start sending out brochures to recruit students. Short said recruitment of graduate students is important.

Because K-State is small at the graduate level, recruitment is more personal. He said representatives go to fairs to recruit as well.

"We get a lot more one-to-one selling," Short said.

The college wants its graduate program to be at the cutting edge, he said. To do that, the college needs to stay in contact with the best business programs in the nation.

"To be an innovator, you must stay in touch with innovators," Short said. "The strategy in curriculum development is to steal every good idea everyone else has."

The college is also planning to enhance student advising.

"If a student is struggling in a course, a faculty adviser may be able to help them if it is caught early enough," Short said.

Diversity in curriculum is also being discussed, he said.

"To separate international courses or to have international sections in the courses is the ongoing debate about what is the proper vehicle," Short said.

The college also wants to emphasize scholarship activities of the faculty, he said.

Senate resolution calls for HIV testing changes director of student health, said the Student Health Advisory Committee met Monday and invited Burns to discuss his concerns.

Zweimiller said students are told how the tests are handled at Lafene and informed of their alternatives.

Testing there is confidential but not anonymous. Zweimiller said blood is sent to the lab anonymously, but the results go on the student's record.

Patients can receive anonymous testing at centers like the Riley County Health Department, because they are one-time patients there, he said.

Lafene's charges more than the health department because it has to use a private lab, he said.

The state lab at the center can be used for some testing procedures, he said. But because HIV testing is federally funded, Lafene cannot use state facilities.

HIV testing has three stages, Zweimiller said. The first two are screens, and if they come back positive, a third test must be done.

Lafene charges $28 for all three tests — $20 for the lab and $8 for Lafene. Zweimiller said KU's Watkins Health Center charges $18.50 for the first two tests, and $93 for the third test if it is needed.

Zweimiller said he is hesitant to agree to free HIV testing, because Lafene is supported by student fees. Free testing could cause student fees to go up. But, he said, the center listens to students' wishes.

Also on Thursday's agenda is a bill to limit the time students have to appeal to the University president for violating the Student Conduct Code, and the Bramlage Coliseum fee continuance.

problems. "I have strong grassroots, but I don't have the publicity," O'Dell said, contrasting herself to Dole.

O'Dell said her campaign should have added a profile mix instead of competing with Dole in a black-and-white manner.

In retrospect, she said, she wished she would have incorporated aspects into her campaign to attract bipartisan voters from Dole's camp, which would have strengthened her overall campaign.

While commending Dole for winning, O'Dell said she found real problems with his campaign.

"Dole ran a politically correct campaign," she said. "He ran his campaign to counteract his weaknesses."

Dole campaigned in the state only where he people felt their problems were not being addressed by the candidates, O'Dell said.

The rest of the time, she said, he was traveling around the nation in the role of Senate minority leader, promoting other Republican candidates.

"Even when Dole was in the state, he never addressed the issues. He didn't say 'This is what I did, and this is what I will do,'" she said.

"That kind of campaign, while successful, leaves a strong impression on voters," O'Dell said. "Instead of running as a servant of the people, Dole was running for the office itself."

With Dole headed back to Washington, O'Dell said her first priority is paying off her $120,000 campaign debt.

"I will ask people in the Democratic Party for help," she said.

She also plans to contact organizations that support women in political offices and stage fund-raising events.

"I plan to have the debt covered in six months," she said.

O'Dell said she will continue to be part of the political process.

"I want to continue to be involved. I am looking for opportunities to be a candidate on the state or national level," she said.

She also wants to help search for future candidates to challenge Dole.

Reader wonders where questions come from

YOU'RE ASKING ME?

by Cassandra Duveaux

DEAR CASSANDRA,

I read your column occasionally, but sometimes I don't even think it is worth it. Where do you come up with these questions? Do actual people write in to you, or do you make them up? Please respond to this, because I would like to know if your column is legitimate or just a waste of space.

G.H., K-State student

DEAR G.H.,

I will let you be the judge as to how much wasted space "You're Asking Me?" actually occupies. As to your questions: Yes, actual people write in to me with the questions you have been reading in this column. I do not have the time (nor the imagination) to write any of it. I barely manage to find the time to write the answers.

I suspect some of the questions that are submitted are contrived, but as long as they address an issue, I feel they may stimulate discussion. So, I go ahead and print them. If you think that what you have seen in print is wild, you should see the mail that couldn't be put into the column for editorial reasons.

Anyone who wishes to see my "legitimate" mail can stop by the Collegian and do so. By the way, many thanks to all you readers for writing. Cassandra could not do it without you.

DEAR CASSANDRA,

Why don't people just get off it and realize that men are pigs, and women are too glib to realize it until it's too late!

Used and Abused Senior

DEAR USED AND ABUSED,

I don't think men have a monopoly on ill-manners any more than women do on naivete. It takes all kinds to make the world go around. I think you should seek out a friend or counselor to help you talk out some of your hostility. Please.

DEAR CASSANDRA,

I have a problem, and so do many other people on my dorm floor. A certain individual likes to mooch off of other people. And then, when making conversation, he only talks about himself and his girlfriend and has a tendency to say the wrong things at the wrong time.

Many people, including myself, have noticed this character flaw in this person. A friend of mine and I have mentioned to him that he has a problem and that he needs to solve it.

He listened to what we had to say in the beginning and worked on his problem, but only for a short time. Now, three weeks later after the first confrontation, he is back to his old tricks.

I have come to my wits end to help him discover a solution. Why should I help someone who won't help himself? Please, this individual is driving our floor nuts. We need your help immediately.

Annoyed, Irritated and Just Plain Old Tired

DEAR ANNOYED,

First, show your friend this column. Reading about how he appears to others may shock him into doing something more permanent about it. However, if you really intend to extend help to Mr. Mooch, you need to be more patient and understanding. Three weeks is not enough time in which to alter one's behavior. You are expecting him to change years of bad habits overnight.

Applying some gentle peer pressure may also prompt your friend to clean up his act. The "mooching" can easily be remedied — simply do not lend or give him anything. Just politely say "No" when he comes around begging.

As for his conversation, it takes two to talk. The ultimate sanction would be to ignore him if he constantly dwells on himself in conversation with others. However, you and your friends can try to be a little more tolerant. After all, he does have a girlfriend. So, somebody has found a way to get along with him. Maybe his girlfriend is the key. Good luck.

LONDON LECTURE

CNN anchor to speak

CNN anchor Bernard Shaw will present the Landon Lecture at 10:30 a.m. today in McCain Auditorium.

JULIE LONG
Collegian

Bernard Shaw, principal CNN anchor, will speak on the mistreatment of women in America in the Landon Lecture this morning in McCain Auditorium.

Shaw was one of three CNN reporters who covered the first night of the bombing on Baghdad during Operation Desert Storm.

He spent Thursday talking to about 30 journalism students during a News and Feature Writing class. He stressed the need for honesty in journalism and said journalists can't deceive themselves.

"It forces you to be honest with yourself," he said.

Shaw said reporters who aren't honest can't be believed and will eventually lose their credibility.

"The only thing a journalist has is his or her credibility," he said.

If reporters lose credibility, screw up facts or appear partisan, they're finished, Shaw said.

The Western tradition of journalism is to be fair, balanced and tell both sides of the story, he said.

To succeed in journalism today, he said, a person has to have talent, drive, determination and luck. A journalist also has to have good instincts and be able to trust those instincts.

Shaw advised students not to be afraid to fail. In journalism, he said, people have to be self-starters who aren't afraid to take risks and can learn from their failures.

REDEFINING K-STATE ACADEMICS

College changes little

Human ecology trying to be efficient, Dean Stowe says

DIANE DENISON
Collegian

EDITOR'S NOTE: The Kansas Board of Regents has called for new Role and Aspirations Statements from each state university. This is the fifth story in a series on what K-State's colleges are doing to fulfill this mandate.

The College of Human Ecology will maintain most of its programs as they are, with only a few proposed changes.

"We are looking to improve the college in a more efficient way," Dean Barbara Stowe said.

Proposed eliminations include the pre-law program, the master's options in life span human development and in human development and family studies, and the doctoral program in life span human development.

Stowe said this has to be done because the college can no longer afford to hire part-time faculty from outside professions to teach some of the classes when more full-time faculty is needed.

"It's too bad that it has to change, but I think they're trying to do it for the best interest of the students," said Tamara DeWeese, senior in early childhood development.

Stowe said plans to strengthen the undergraduate degree in hotel and restaurant management are needed because faculty members are teaching large classes.

Expansion is proposed for other programs, such as the graduate programs in adolescence and youth, and clothing, textiles and interior design, Stowe said, but senior faculty is needed to supervise graduate research.

Jacquelyn Pinney, junior in human ecology, said any changes made would be good for the

STUDENT SENATE

Lafene testing resolution read

KIM MCNITT

Some student senators may have experienced déjà vu as the Athletic Fee passed at the Nov. 12 meeting was discussed again Thursday night.

Due to new information presented during the open period of the regular Student Senate meeting, a motion was made to reconsider last week's decision to increase full-time student athletic fees to $17 per semester and part-time fees to $8.50. However, the motion to reconsider failed 19 to 31, with only one senator abstaining.

Bill Wood, senior in business and at-large member of the Finance Committee, told Senate members his goal was to get them to reconsider the Athletic Fee. Wood was one of 17 people slated to speak Nov. 12 when the motion was called to be put to a vote and then passed.

According to Wood, the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics will use the fee increase to pay off debts that have accumulated from overspending during the last several years.

Wood argued that it is not fair for students to have to pay for debts they did not acquire, particularly since the athletic department is planning construction of a new press box and indoor practice facility.

Senate also heard the first reading of a bill encouraging Lafene Health Center to make available anonymous testing for HIV, sexually transmitted diseases and pregnancy. The bill also encourages Lafene to find less expensive testing methods.

Lafene currently performs these tests, but they go on the student's health record, according to Larry Moeller, Lafene chief of staff. Many places, such as the Manhattan-Riley County Health Department, offer anonymous tests.

There were 163 HIV tests given at Lafene last year, Moeller said. He said that in a study done

BOARD OF REGENTS

Schedule set for program evaluations

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Each state university is supposed to have a mission and aspirations for itself.

Taxpayers could find out what those lofty concepts actually mean early next year.

The state Board of Regents set its schedule Thursday for evaluating programs at its six universities and determining what role each will play in the state system.

The regents have been working to define each institution's place for six years.

At the same time, the regents chose not to make a recommendation to the Legislature on how it can use its power to appropriate money to reward regents schools for improving their teaching.

It voted to delay studying the concept of "performance funding" until at least June 1993.

"We feel it really has merit, but the timing is not right," said Regent Shirley Palmer of Fort Scott.

The regents drafted mission statements for the universities in December 1986, after legislators complained their programs too often duplicated each other — at taxpayer expense.

They began reviewing those statements in 1990.

Under the new schedule, in December the regents would consider proposals from each

Cooperative education gets grant

JANET SATTERLEE
Collegian

K-State has received $128,000 from the U.S. Department of Education for the first year of a five-year grant to expand the cooperative education program offered by the Career Planning and Placement Center.

"K-State has a great, great potential for competing in a co-op program," program coordinator Toni Herzog said.

Jim Akin, director of the Career Planning and Placement Center, said the program is similar to an internship program.

Internships are usually longer than co-op opportunities, he said, but a co-op education program has a set of guidelines, goals, a paper trail and follow-up that some internships do not have.

"Cooperative education is a program to expand working opportunities under the umbrella of an educational program so the work is related to education objectives and career objectives," Akin said.

Herzog said the staff is trying to integrate all nine colleges in the co-op education program.

No requirements have been set

NADER NABS KANSAS ON ENERGY USE

WASHINGTON (AP) — Kansas has the worst energy-use practices in the nation, and the state relies too much on "dirty, dangerous and depletable energy resources," a consumer group said Thursday.

A report by Public Citizen, a group founded by consumer activist Ralph Nader, criticized Kansas for using few renewable energy sources and inefficient or heavy energy use by residential and industrial customers.

The group ranked Kansas below all other states and the District of Columbia on an "overall energy scoreboard," which combined several indicators of energy use.

Bush's mother dies at age 91

Dorothy Walker Bush suffered stroke Wednesday

ASSOCIATED PRESS

GREENWICH, Conn. — Dorothy Bush, a senator's wife who taught her son George with "generous measures of both love and discipline" and lived to see him elected to the White House, died Thursday. She was 91.

Dorothy Bush, who had suffered a stroke, died shortly after 5 p.m. at the family home here, said spokesman Marlin Fitzwater in Washington.

President Bush had flown to Connecticut Thursday morning to be with his mother but was back in the capital when she died.

After her son was elected in 1988, Dorothy Bush said: "I've been ready to have him be president, since he chose to work for it, but I pray to God for him because it's the toughest job in the world."

President Bush said his mother and father, the late Sen. Prescott Bush, were the most important people in his life. His 1987 autobiography, "Looking Forward," is dedicated to both parents.

"Dad taught us about duty and service," the president wrote. "Mother taught us about dealing with life on a personal basis, relating to other people."

Just before he took the oath of office as president on Jan. 20, 1989, Bush spotted his mother on the platform, leaned over to kiss her and said, "Many of our family are here, and they all, as does this son, worship the ground she walks on."

The president regularly visited his mother at her home here or her winter home in Jupiter Island, Fla.

Dorothy Bush's 90th birthday in July 1991 was an occasion for a rare

Given the evidence, the clues and the possibilities the experts have on JFK conspiracy theories, you are left to decide.

That is the purpose of the three-hour lecture dealing with the November 22, 1963 assassination of former President John F. Kennedy in Dallas, Texas.

Casey Quinlan, a history teacher at Olathe East High School, will present the possible conspiracies in the government, the Mafia and within the entertainment industry in his lecture.

"You're just bombarded with ideas from every angle. He really doesn't tell you what he thinks. He lets you decide," said Christopher Stipe, a member of the Union Program Council Issues and Ideas committee. UPC is sponsoring the lecture at 7 p.m. Monday in K-State Union Forum Hall.

Quinlan has actively researched the Kennedy assassination for the last 24 years, Stipe said. He said Quinlan did his master's thesis on the assassination, and in addition to his own research, has attended several conferences at the JFK assassination research center in Dallas.

"He gets a lot of information from (the conferences) every year and gets to talk to a lot of people who were actually there at the assassination," Stipe said.

Quinlan has interviewed Lee Harvey Oswald's widow and is engaged in a search to find a missing home video of the assassination, Stipe said.

Wade Sisson, UPC committee member, said it is important for people to learn more about the assassination.

"I think it's something people need to know about. It's important to remember the past. The truth still isn't known about the assassination," Sisson said. "It's time for the new generation to get in there and find out what happened."

Quinlan has given similar lectures at Emporia State University and the University of Kansas.

THE PRESIDENTIAL TRANSITION

Clinton visits capitol

President-elect spends 2 days meeting with both officials, citizens

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — President-elect Clinton made a whirlwind visit to Capitol Hill Thursday.

He pledged an open door to Democrats and Republicans alike and to meet halfway on an early agenda of economic revival and health-care reform.

"I think we're off to a good start," Clinton said after 6 1/2 hours of meetings on Capitol Hill, as congressional leaders from both parties nodded in agreement. "I'm excited by it."

Clinton also met with Gen. Colin Powell, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, for a wide-ranging briefing on military, national security and foreign policy issues.

Powell reiterated his opposition to lifting the ban on homosexuals in the military, but he said he would help implement the change if Clinton kept his promise to reverse the ban.

"I'm very pleased that he has said he will move carefully in full consultation with military leaders and others who have an interest in this matter," Powell said in Pennsylvania before returning to Washington.

Clinton was finishing a busy two-day visit to Washington, his first since winning the Nov. 3 election. His stay was rich with symbols not only of how he plans to govern but of how he hopes to keep in touch with everyday folks.

In one 24-hour stretch, Clinton's stops also included a

White House meeting with President Bush, a visit to a crime-scarred city neighborhood, an elegant dinner party, a stay in a posh hotel, a jog past Washington's monuments and into McDonald's and a visit with commuters on a city bus.

As Clinton captured the capitol spotlight, a host of transition aides quietly went to work on Capitol Hill and throughout the city. Several Clinton economic advisers also met with congressional staff.

The Arkansas governor came to Capitol Hill carrying a promise of bipartisan cooperation and left predicting lawmakers would reciprocate.

"We have to pursue a different course of growing this economy, creating more jobs, raising incomes and having a disciplined plan to reduce the

OPINION

NOVEMBER 20, 1992

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

IN OUR OPINION

By the Collegian Editorial Board

AIDS now threatens everyone

THE ISSUE

A recent journal article revealed that heterosexuals are doing a poor job of protecting themselves against AIDS.

WE SUGGEST

We should realize the extreme danger before it becomes worse than it already is.

What was once a disease only associated with homosexuals and drug users is now one that threatens everyone equally.

AIDS

A recent article in the journal "Science" reported that heterosexuals are being as irresponsible in their sexual habits as drug users and homosexuals were a few years back, when the disease exploded onto the scene.

People are failing to take adequate measures to protect themselves. They are still locked into the idea that AIDS poses no threat to "straight" people.

"Heterosexuals are not thinking about the future," said Joseph Catania, a researcher for the University of California-San Francisco Center for AIDS Prevention Studies. "They are playing a very risky game."

If the journal is any indication of future behavior, plenty will go wrong, and AIDS cases will escalate dramatically. This means more deaths and increased stress on health-care costs in America.

Unfortunately, AIDS is still one of those diseases that "happens to other people." Unlike cancer or heart disease, it has yet to be prevalent enough to scare people into taking measures to keep themselves alive.

A low-fat diet and 20 push-ups a day won't keep AIDS away.

Only when it takes lives on the same scale of these other diseases will AIDS be considered a serious threat.

America needs to realize now that AIDS threatens every aspect of our lives.

Whatever your orientation, it would be wise to start treating AIDS like the thing it is: a killer.

'Huck Finn' loud shout against racism

"All modern American literature comes from one book by Mark Twain called 'Huckleberry Finn' ... it's the best book we've had. ... There was nothing before. There has been nothing as good since."

—Ernest Hemingway

It was reported earlier this week that some students attending a junior college in Hartford, Conn., were opposed to renaming their school after Mark Twain.

The protest concerned Twain's treatment of black people in his many books, especially "Huckleberry Finn."

There isn't really anything unique about the Hartford protest. Twain's masterpiece has been banned from a number of American public schools and libraries across the United States.

In fact, it's been censored more than any other book in American history. Parents, teachers and moral crusaders have always found the book an easy target.

Now, I'm not so sure you'd want to name your school after Mark Twain. But I am convinced that "Huckleberry Finn" is one of the most vigorous literary attacks against racism that has ever been written.

Twain employs a number of techniques in his book to debunk racist ideology.

To begin with, Twain's treatment of the two main characters, Huck and Jim, necessarily serves this purpose.

Huck's character undergoes a radical shift in consciousness. At the start of his journey on the raft with Jim, Huck maintains the popular racist sentiment of the times and perceives Jim to be mere property.

But as the two characters spend time together, celebrating one ordeal after another, Huck moves beyond stereotyping and comes to see Jim as a person. He categorically rejects the need to be accepted by his racist peers and instead makes a stand against what he views to be an immoral way of life.

With Jim's portrayal, Twain skillfully reveals that race ought not be a measure of one's character. Jim proves to be thoughtful, intelligent, compassionate and sensitive.

What's more, I think it is fair to say that Jim is the first black hero in American literary fiction.

Twain also engages in a variety of literary techniques to reveal the shallow nature of racism.

DAVID FILIPPI

The first noticeable method involves ironic reversal. As Huck begins to believe that his own behavior is immoral, the reader is made to recognize Huck's innate morality.

Moreover, Twain takes advantage of narrative. Not only does this literary form effectively personalize Jim's plight, but the reader is exposed to the cruelty inherent in racial discourse.

Thus, critics of "Huckleberry Finn" may be quick to point out that the book is chock full of racial slurs and demeaning labels, but that's not the message of the book.

As Vivian Wilson of the Hastings College of Law has pointed out, Twain's work "uncompromisingly reveals the reticular connection of the language of slavery to the institution, thus exposing the ways in which racist speech is inextricable from the ideology and practices of racism."

If you're unfamiliar with this book, or it's been awhile since you've read it, you might take some time over the Thanksgiving holiday to relax and enjoy.

And maybe this time through, be especially aware of how Twain works to debunk racism as an ideology.

I think you'll realize that the book's message is just as important for today's society as it was more than a century ago.

dictionary.

They looked up the words, black and white. While watching the movie, I didn't think that could have possibly been true.

I looked them up myself, and it was.

"Black" is defined in Webster's as "the opposite of white; having dark colored skin and hair; totally without light, soiled, dirty; evil, wicked, harmful; disgraceful; full of sorrow or suffering; sullen or angry (black looks)."

And there are even more words connected with the word "black" with similar definitions.

Black ball, black mail, Black Death, black guard, black list, black mark and black markets are some of them.

Grab a dictionary. I'm just getting going.

Then I looked up the word "white."

"White" was defined as "having the color of pure snow; morally and spiritually pure; spotless; innocent; free from evil intent; harmless; honest; honorable; fair." And the list goes on.

After reading the biography, I wondered what I could do to change things — to change race relations in the United States.

Malcolm answered a question similar to mine in the movie as a white, female, college student walks up to him. She approaches him outside as he walks with three of his Muslim brothers and she asks, "What can I do?"

He said, "Nothing," and walked past her.

I ached as I sat in the theater and thought about the statement. Is there really nothing I can do?

The saddest thing is that race relations in this country aren't any better than when Malcolm was alive.

But I think there is something I can do, something everyone can do: open our eyes and ears.

Because everything we are told isn't always true. And everything we see isn't always as it seems.

Malcolm spoke about an issue that a lot of people wanted to ignore, and maybe that is why he was disliked by some.

But the movie is much more than the story of a man's life. It is about empowering oneself through education.

And now I know better than to wait for someone to teach me everything. Some things you just have to learn on your own.

COLUMNS

Columns are the opinions of only the columnist. They do not reflect the views of the Kansas State Collegian, but instead offer a differing viewpoint.

READERS WRITE

FEMINISM

Ideas of column not clearly understood

Editor,

I feel compelled to respond to John Hart's Nov. 16 column. His column has been attacked due to the misconstruing of what he wrote.

Hart never once said that a woman should or could not be a successful person. In fact, he said he respected women who are in the work force. He admits that environments many women work in are hostile.

Hart used the line of submissiveness in marriage quoted in the Bible, one that many feminists use to claim the Bible is sexist. I have, however, assumed that you care greatly for the person you marry. Submissiveness has the synonym of "to commit," which is exactly what marriage is — a commitment.

From a Christian viewpoint, I see the downfall of today's families as a result of our decaying morals.

Julie Arnold
Junior/Elementary education must it be the female? I simply cannot accept that Mr. Hart believes a submissive nature is innate in women and not due to centuries of socialization. He offers no evidence to support this idea other than a quote he has interpreted to suit his needs.

If the feminist movement has given an abused, neglected woman the belief that she can stand on her own, that she doesn't need to be dependent on her husband, that she doesn't have to submit to anyone, I can only stand up and applaud.

Jennifer Johnson
Junior/Theater

LAST ON FEMINISM

Anatomy is the only consistent difference

Editor,

I would like to know why John Hart believes that being born with a penis entitles him to special consideration.

You make many overgeneralizations concerning the differences between men and women, but the only consistent difference between the two is reproductive anatomy. True, feminists recognize this fact and realize that differing anatomy has no bearing on a person's ability to perform the job of their choice.

It comes down to this: Everyone has a right to pursue his or her chosen course in life and be rewarded equally.

All interpersonal relationships are strongest when two people enter into them freely and stay with them because they want to and not because they have to. Stripping women of their ability to care for themselves does not help build a solid relationship and is not healthy.

I do agree that sacrifice and selflessness are an integral part of all close relationships, but both parties must give 100 percent. If you haven't learned this yet, I doubt that you have ever had a loving, close relationship with anyone — including the God that you worship.

Please don't think that I have a vendetta against men or Christianity. Many of my closest friends are men, and I am a practicing Christian. As a general rule, I like men — just not men like you.

'X' gives deeper insight into an unknown world

After seeing Spike Lee's newest release, "Malcolm X," I felt cheated.

I felt cheated because there was so much about the man I had never heard about before. So much I was never taught.

I'm sure it had a little to do with growing up in a small, all-white town. History of black leaders wasn't in my school's curriculum.

When I came to K-State, however, I was assigned to read the Alex Haley biography in a class. So, I went into the movie with some background.

Malcolm X's legacy shouldn't be limited to only being taught in a black history class. His strength and struggle is a lesson that can be learned in many curriculums.

His autobiography should be read in English courses and his perseverance talked about in leadership classes, his honesty about race relations carried over into sociology classes.

He may not have been a leader with whom everyone agreed, but he fit the description of a leader.

In Webster's Dictionary, a leader is defined as "someone who leads; directing, commanding or guiding head of a group or activity." Whether self-appointed or looked to by a number of people who had the same beliefs, Malcolm became a voice for those who otherwise weren't being listened to.

And while looking in Webster's, I decided to check up on the authenticity of a scene in the movie.

While in jail, Malcolm learned about the Muslim faith from another inmate. In the beginning, Malcolm wasn't very responsive to what the inmate had to say. But the inmate began to persuade Malcolm to listen to him by taking him to the prison library, where they began to study the Singers to share in festivities

Director says concert will offer something for all

BILL SPIEGEL

Homecoming festivities will continue Saturday night with the annual Homecoming Concert by the K-State Singers, the Men's Glee Club and the Women's Glee Club.

Gerald Polich, director of the musical groups, said the concert will provide a wide array of musical numbers for the audience.

"Each group will sing a variety of music," he said, adding that the musical numbers will vary from gospel to popular.

Laura Terry, sophomore in journalism, and a member of the Women's Glee Club, said the concert will be a good experience.

"This is our first big concert as a group. We're singing some real good pieces," she said.

The Women's Glee Club, made up of 74 members, will sing nine songs, including "The Music of the Night" from Andrew Lloyd Weber's "Phantom of the Opera."

The 73-member Men's Glee Club will perform a diverse set of music, ranging from spiritual music to popular tunes such as "Unchained Melody." They will conclude with their popular medley of Big Eight Conference Fight

SINGING FOR K-STATE

Songs.

Mike Prothe, senior in finance and Men's Glee Club member said touring area high schools will give the group some experience in singing in front of a large audience.

"This is usually the biggest concert of the year for us," Prothe said.

The K-State Singers will perform tunes from several decades. Included will be a medley of George Gershwin show tunes, as well as a medley of Big Band songs.

Mark Schultz, senior in marketing and Singers member, said everybody is excited about getting caught up in the atmosphere of Homecoming.

Polich said the annual event originally started on Parent's Day seven years ago. This year, the groups were unable to perform in McCain on Parent's Day, so they moved it to Homecoming Weekend.

"The concert is an opportunity for parents to come to campus and see the groups perform," he said.

'Traditional' play at McCain

MATT CUNNINGHAM

For three hours, McCain Auditorium will be the home for impoverished Russian Jews who will sing, dance, fall in love and defy traditions.

McCain Auditorium is the place for the sold-out, professional production of "Fiddler on the Roof," Sunday night.

"Fiddler on the Roof" is about a Jewish family in pre-revolutionary Russia with daughters growing up, falling in love and breaking with the traditions of the old world.

"Fiddler on the Roof" is a well-known play, performed by the professional Troika Organization, which is primarily devoted to musical theater.

It was put together by a group of producers associated with many theatrical endeavors including "Brigadoon," "Meet Me in St. Louis," "Little Shop of Horrors," "Singin' in the Rain" and many more.

"Fiddler" opened on the Broadway stage in 1964 and includes a member of the original cast as the director of this production, Sammy Dallas Bayes, worked with the original choreographer, Jerome Robbins, and is using the original dance routines in the show.

"He has recreated the choreography and has a long history with working with 'Fiddler,'" Troika public relations director Bradford Watkins said.

It took a year's preparation to bring the musical to McCain.

"We started last October and found a date that was convenient for the both of us," McCain Auditorium director Richard Martin said.

The production troupe will be on the road for seven months, said Stuart Soloway, sales representative for Music Theater Associates, the booking agent.

"They started in mid-September and will be playing through mid-March," he said, "going to 90 to 100 cities with slightly more performances."

Technicians and 28 cast members are involved in the performance.

"The technicians load into the theater at 8 a.m. and work all the way up to 5 p.m.," Watkins said. "At 6:15 p.m., the techs test out sound system."

The performance will be at 7:30 p.m. Sunday in McCain Auditorium.

■ "Raising Cain" will play at 7 and 9:30 p.m. today and Saturday, and at 7 p.m. Sunday in Union Forum Hall.

"Raising Cain" brings new meaning to the phrase "psychological thriller."

John Lithgow plays Carter Nix, the unfortunate result of a string of psychological experiments performed on him in his infancy by his father.

The result of these experiments is a splintered personality, with different incarnations.

Lithgow turns in the performance of his career as he portrays the evil Cain, the innocent Carter, seven-year-old Josh and middle-aged Margo, all within the same mind.

The filming reflects the state of mind of someone with split personalities, as it contains a stream-of-consciousness quality. Events that happen early on can only be explained by events that happen later.

This is the type of film you will understand much more thoroughly the second time around. Many questions are answered when you know where the film is going.

Conversely, the entertaining aspect of this film is having no idea what is going on until the final credits, if then. This film is genuinely frightening, as the lead character(s) are capable of being anyone, anytime, doing anything.

This film is sure to entertain. It is a shocking thriller and well worth your time.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

WEEKEND
CONFERENCE
PREVIEWBIG 8
CONFERENCE

► IOWA STATE at COLORADO

FAST FACTS: 1 p.m., Folsom Field, Boulder, Colo.

RECORDS: Iowa State (4-6, 2-4) and Colorado (8-1-1, 4-1-1).

THE LINE: Colorado by 18.

ABOUT THE CYCLONES: Iowa State is coming off of one of this year's biggest upsets in college football after embarrassing then-No. 7 Nebraska in Ames, 19-10. The Cyclone defense held Nebraska, which leads the nation in rushing, to only 192 yards on the ground and 246 yards of total offense.

In last year's matchup with CU, Iowa State outgained the Buffs 271-243 in total yardage and had 18 first downs to Colorado's nine but still lost 17-14. Their last road excursion resulted in a 22-13 loss to K-State.

ABOUT THE BUFFALOES: CU's 25-18 win against Kansas, coupled with Nebraska's faux pas in Ames, revived Colorado's shot at the Big Eight championship. The No. 11 Buffs are ranked first in the conference in defense, yielding just 275 yards a game, and second in offense with 401 yards a game.

Quarterback Kordell Stewart has given life to Colorado's passing attack, averaging 227 yards a game through the air, good for 19th nationally.

CU's Achilles' heel is still turnovers. They have turned the ball over 35 times in 10 games.

THE SKINNY: This will be the last home game for the Buffalo senior class, and that, along with their revived chances for an Orange Bowl berth, will have the Buffs ready to play.

Despite ISU's win over Nebraska, the Cyclones have been outscored 87-44 in road games. Look for CU to more than cover the spread.

► KANSAS at MISSOURI

FAST FACTS: 1 p.m., Memorial Stadium, Columbia, Mo.

RECORDS: Kansas (7-3, 4-2) and Missouri (2-8, 1-5).

THE LINE: Kansas by 7 1/2.

ABOUT THE JAYHAWKS: Consecutive losses to Nebraska and Colorado have taken the steam out of Orange Bowl talk in Lawrence. With a bowl game assured, there isn't much emotionally for KU to play for except to break the losing streak.

Tailbacks Monte Cozzens and Maurice Douglas have more than made up for the graduation of Tony Sands, although Cozzens suffered a season-ending injury last week.

The Hawks have run the ball 506 times in 10 games while attempting just 229 passes.

ABOUT THE TIGERS: The Tigers' 27-14 win over K-State broke the two-season long hangover caused by 13 straight losses to Division I schools. Quarterback Jeff Handy is averaging 233 yards a game, tops in the Big Eight and 16th in the nation.

THE SKINNY: Unless Coach Glen Mason leaves his tailbacks on the bus, KU should shred Mizzou's rushing defense. Missouri isn't much better defensively than last year, when MU let Tony Sands run for an NCAA-record 396 yards on 58 carries in Lawrence.

Missouri will have an emotional edge as they play for pride and Coach Bob Stull, who remains on the coaching hot seat. This game could be closer than most think, but expect a W for the Hawks.

Lady Cats' new season starts Sunday

CRAIG HACKER/Collegian

Dana Pollock, redshirt freshman guard, receives instructions from Lady Cats' head coach Susan Yow during practice Wednesday in Ahearn Field House. K-State opens its season at 2 p.m. Sunday at Bramlage Coliseum with an exhibition game against the Czechoslovakian club team.

Coach Yow worried team's practice efforts before exhibition game

BRIAN ANDERSON
Collegian

Susan Yow begins her third season as coach of the Lady Cats with an exhibition game against the Cassovia-Kosice-Czechoslovakia team at 2 p.m. Sunday at Bramlage Coliseum.

During the last 15 practices of the season preparation, the team has had to absorb a lot of new plays.

"Practices have been good, but it's too early to tell," Yow said. "We put in a lot of time in zone offense, man-to-man offense, zone defense, man-to-man defense, in-bound plays and plays from a missed free throw.

"They have listened well and have retained the information."

One problem the squad has is not putting an effort into every practice.

"They have been inconsistent in working hard," Yow said. "The team sees it as a problem as well. It won't be a problem for us this season."

One player who has been working hard in practice is freshman Stacy Neal.

"She has done the best job of all the guards," Yow said of the 1991-92 Converse High School all-American who will start at guard Sunday.

"She has done a great job of picking up of the plays in the short amount of time. She has the natural tendencies of a guard."

Along with Neal, senior Kelly Moylan will play at the guard position.

"We talked about shot selection and when to shoot," Yow said of Moylan, who ranked third in the conference in 3-point shooting last year at 39.3 percent. "She's going to get her points."

Leah Honeycutt, the other senior and captain of the team, will play the middle against Czechoslovakia. Honeycutt leads all returning players in points per game (10.3), rebounds (7.9) and minutes played (996 minutes in 28 games).

At the forward positions, Yow will start Cloud County transfer Shanelle Stires and sophomore JoMoree Grattan.

"Stires seems to have performed the best out of our four and five players," Yow said. "She is valuable in that she can play both positions and can rebound."

As the tallest Lady Cat at 6-foot-2, Grattan appeared in 24 games as she recorded a team-high of eight blockshots last year. She finished last season with a season-high six rebounds against Colorado in the Big Eight Tournament.

The only player who is forced to watch from the sidelines because of injury is forward Pam Stoltz, who averaged 5.3 points and 4.3 rebounds per game in her freshman year.

"Stoltz injured her knee in late July," Yow said. "She is about 75-percent recovered."

CHEERING OR JEERING?

Wildcat fans' behavior questioned

SCOTT ABEL
Collegian

Though K-State's fans have won an award for sportsmanship in the past, they probably won't get a vote from the Iowa State Cyclones this year.

In the aftermath of the last home game, a nationally televised matchup against Iowa State, in which fans ripped down the north-end goal post, the maturity of K-State's fans has been put into question.

During the course of the game, the Iowa State cheerleaders said they were spit on by fans on the southeast end at the stadium and were repeatedly hit by ice, hard candy and spare change.

"It was bad," Shilo DeReu, Cyclone cheerleader, said. "There were a lot of objects thrown, and one of our cheerleaders even had paint thrown on her. It was a lot worse than prior schools we visited."

Scott Jaden, one of the Iowa State mascots, said he was also a target of abuse by fans.

"A lot of kids spit, and there were drinks thrown. Usually you can just pat them on the back, but that just wasn't the case. It wasn't a big deal to me (in the costume), but things like the paint-throwing really made a lot of us mad."

Jaden said the K-State mascot, "Willie the Wildcat," was also part of their trouble. During the second half, he said, Willie threw a cheerleader's equipment bag containing a purse and other personal belongings into the stadium crowd.

"None of that has been substantiated," K-State Athletic Director Milt Richards said. "I've received no official contact from Iowa State. But I find it hard to believe that our Willie Wildcat would do something like that."

Seniors to make home finale

FRANK KLEEMANN

The Wildcats want to play with added emotion — a factor missing from last week's loss to Missouri — when they play Saturday at KSU Stadium. The 4-5 Wildcats take on Oklahoma State Cowboys at 1:10 p.m.

It's homecoming, and it's the last game in Manhattan for 21 seniors. This final home stand should entice the Cats to play an emotional game, Coach Bill Snyder said.

"If it's not, I throw my hands up," he said. "We have a lot of fine young guys who are ready to play their last ball game in front of the fans. I believe it will be a very emotional game."

The players, particularly seniors, are looking forward to their last game wearing the purple and white in front of a large home crowd.

"I think coming back home, having the last home game and with the number of seniors we have, it's very important to us," said senior linebacker Brooks Barta, who leads the Cats in tackles.

Eric Gallon, senior running back, said playing the final home game would be special to him.

And for senior wide receiver Gerald Benton, looking back at last week is enough incentive for him to have an emotional game.

"Emotions should be there," he said.

"I think the seniors will get out and give everything."

GERALD BENTON

"It's our last home game, and the motivation is to come out this weekend and show them that we are not the 'Mildcats.'"

"It should be a big game for the seniors. I think the seniors will get out and give everything."

But Benton warned that just the fact of having the last home game and accompanying emotions don't guarantee a win. The Cowboys' 2-3-1 Big Eight record shows its improvement from last season's 0-7 conference finish.

"Oklahoma State is a good team. They have good players," Benton said. "I'm looking at it as if we're playing Nebraska. I never underestimate a team."

Brent Venables, senior linebacker, said K-State isn't in a situation to

Krieg returns to Kingdome

Chiefs' QB returns to Seattle to face old team

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SEATTLE — Dave Krieg, who spent his first dozen seasons in the NFL with Seattle, returns to the Kingdome on Sunday to play against his former team, the Seahawks.

The new starting quarterback for the Kansas City Chiefs doesn't know how the Seahawks' fans will react.

"I've had them both," he said. "Whatever the fans do, that's their business. But I have nothing but great memories there."

Krieg will be trying to help the Chiefs (6-4) win their third straight game and pin another loss on the Seahawks, who have lost seven in a row and are 1-9.

Krieg, 34, will be facing his former team for the second time this season.

The Chiefs beat the Seahawks 26-7 in Kansas City in Week 2. Krieg teamed with J.J. Birden on a 72-yard touchdown strike in that game.

In Krieg's 12 seasons in Seattle, he set club records with 2,096 passes completed, 26,132 passing yards and 195 touchdown passes.

He quarterbacked the Seahawks into the 1983 AFC championship game against the Los Angeles Raiders and into the NFL playoffs three other times.

But Krieg, a hot and cold performer throughout his stint in Seattle, also had his detractors. The fans cheered him, but they booed almost as often.

He set an NFL record with 108 fumbles in Seattle, a mark he has extended to 112.

In 129 games with the Seahawks, including 116 starts, he was intercepted 148 times and sacked 341 times.

Krieg signed as a Plan B free agent with the Chiefs, getting a $1.7 million contract.

Spikers end season with Colorado match

BRIAN ANDERSON

Collegian

K-State's volleyball season comes to an end Saturday night at Ahearn Field House, when the Cats take on the No. 18 Colorado Buffaloes.

The 7-21 Cats have lost their last two matches and are still looking for their first conference win.

If that is to happen against the 19-8 Buffaloes, Coach Patti Hagemeyer said K-State has to get over the intimidation factor.

"We were tentative in the match against Nebraska," she said of the loss Wednesday night to the No. 5 Huskers. "We led early in games two and three. They simply overpowered us to win."

Colorado beat K-State in three games, 15-5, 15-6 and 15-13 on Oct. 17.

"They have great ball control and an excellent defense," Hagemeyer said. "We fought back and even lead the third game 12-6 before they won. They'll be ready."

As the season draws to a close, Hagemeyer said the team and she aren't ready to stop playing.

"We are not excited about the season coming to an end," she said. "It will be disappointing to stop. Our execution was getting better over the past couple of weeks."

While this campaign becomes the fourth straight losing season for the volleyball program, Hagemeyer has looked at the progress of the team to determine how far the squad has come.

"People assume that we are miserable," Hagemeyer said of the losing record. "Winning is a big part of a program, but we're not judging our season on that. We have made great progress since the start of the season."

Future seasons will have to be without senior Kathy Saxton. Saxton's nine kills against the Huskers moved her into a tie for third place on the season kills chart with 493. She needs four more kills to pass Gretchen Anderson for second place.

"I wish I had her for two more years," Hagemeyer said. "She has contributed a lot for the program."

"She makes us work harder," setter Chi Dau, who has assisted Saxton for most of Saxton's 493 kills, said of the senior. "She dares people to step up."

Dau has placed her name high on the assist ledger. She captured the second-most assists in a season by a K-Stater against Nebraska by passing Renee Whitney's 1,062 assists.

"I didn't know what it would take to set the records," Dau said. "I try to be positive and consistent in every game. Patti has taught me a lot."

Match time is 7:30 p.m. Saturday at Ahearn Field House.

Saxton's career comes to a close

Senior has rewritten Wildcat record books in her 4-year reign

TONYA FOSTER

Collegian

The Cats' volleyball leader, senior Kathy Saxton, will play her last home game Saturday night.

But Saxton said she does not expect to cut her ties to the sport she loves.

Although the outside hitter is concentrating on her accounting degree, she is planning for the future.

"Even though I'm not interested in coaching, I'm thinking of grad school and helping coach," Saxton said.

She has made friends among her teammates, she said, and found that she just can't turn away from volleyball.

"They call me Grandma," Saxton said.

Throughout her four-year career at K-State, Saxton has made her mark athletically as well as academically.

She will end the season ranked among the top in kills and attacks in the Big Eight.

This season, she set one Big Eight record — attacks in a four-game match (77) — and four school records, including kills in a three- and four-game match.

Saxton holds the K-State single-season record for both kills (493) and attacks (1,194).

She ranks third and seventh in the Big Eight, respectively.

She was also named to the all-tournament teams in all three tourneys. She was named Big Eight Player of the Week Sept. 8.

On the career ledger, Saxton ranks fourth in kills (1,111), fourth in attacks

(2,513) and third in aces (120).

"I try not to get caught up in it. That's not what it's all about," Saxton said. "I couldn't get the kills without the sets, and I couldn't get the sets without the passes."

Academically, Saxton was named to the 1992 Phillips 66 Academic All-Big Eight Volleyball Honor Roll with a 3.5 grade point average.

"The first thing that makes me smile are the abilities that she's capitalized on in the two years that I have coached her," Coach Patti Hagemeyer said.

"She's done a lot since she's been here. I'm glad that she's had an opportunity at success."

Saxton, the team captain, said so many players on the team could be leaders that there could easily be five captains next year.

"They don't give up; they learn from everything," Saxton said.

Saxton has a lot of faith in the freshmen. She said they have what it takes to turn the program around.

"I hope that I have helped the freshmen," Saxton said. "If anything, I showed them my love for the game."

MAJOR LEAGUE BASEBALL

Eckersley makes it a sweep

■ Oakland's Dennis Eckersley was named the MVP to complement his Cy Young Award.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Oakland reliever Dennis Eckersley, named the American League Cy Young Award winner last week, was also selected the league's Most Valuable Player on Thursday.

Eckersley, who led the majors with 51 saves in 54 chances, is only the ninth player to win both the Cy Young Award and MVP honors in the same season.

He joins Don Newcombe (1956), Sandy Koufax (1963), Denny McLain (1968), Bob Gibson (1968), Vida Blue (1971), Rollie Fingers (1981), Willie Hernandez (1984) and Roger Clemens (1986).

The 38-year-old right-hander is only the fourth reliever to win the MVP.

"Part of me was waiting by the phone because I thought I deserved it," Eckersley said.

"It's hard to say because I'm not that cool to think I deserved an MVP. But if there was any time in my whole life I thought I deserved it, this is the moment."

Eckersley, 7-1 with a 1.91 ERA, received 15 of a possible 28 first-place votes and 306 points in balloting by the Baseball Writers Association of America.

He was followed by Minnesota outfielder Kirby Puckett with 209 points, including three first-place votes, and Toronto outfielder Joe Carter with 201 points and four first-place votes.

Mark McGwire, Dave Winfield and Roberto Alomar also received first-place votes.

"There's a lot of deserving guys out there that have the everyday numbers," Eckersley said. "Everything fell into place. These things come around once in a lifetime."

The AL MVP was expected to be the closest of all the postseason awards, but it didn't turn out that way.

In the AL Cy Young voting last week, Eckersley received 19 of a possible 28 first-place votes.

In 80 innings this season, Eckersley walked only 11.

For winning the MVP award, Eckersley receives a $100,000 bonus, bringing his 1992 income to $3.35 million. Puckett also got a $100,000 bonus.

Eckersley helped the A's win their fourth AL West title in five years, but struggled in the playoffs against Toronto, giving up Alomar's tying, two-run homer in the ninth of Game 4 at Oakland.

Puckett hit .329 for the Twins with 19 home runs and 110 RBIs.

Carter helped the Toronto Blue Jays win the AL East by hitting .264 with 34 homers and 119 RBIs.

SPORTS DIGEST

► KU DRIES UP THE OIL

LAWRENCE (AP) — Eric Pauley and Richard Scott each scored 22 points as No. 2 Kansas crushed Marathon Oil 121-54 in the Jayhawks' exhibition opener Thursday.

Scott contributed 12 of his points during a 40-5 Kansas run.

Scott and Pauley combined to shoot 20-of-27 from the field.

Seven Kansas players reached double figures, including heralded junior-college transfer Darrin Hancock, who scored 15 in his debut. Adonis Jordan also had 15.

► HAWKS SIGN 4 MORE

LAWRENCE (AP) — A point guard, two centers and a forward have signed letters of intent to play at No. 2 Kansas, coach Roy Williams said.

Among the signees is Jacque Vaughn, a point guard from Pasadena, Calif., who's rated the No. 2 point guard and No. 7 overall prospect by recruiting expert Bob Gibbons.

Vaughn, who chose Kansas over Michigan, Indiana, UNLV and Stanford, averaged 23 points, nine assists, seven rebounds and three steals a game.

► KC ACQUIRES LIND

PITTSBURGH (AP) — The Pittsburgh Pirates traded second baseman Jose Lind to the Kansas City Royals on Thursday for two pitching prospects.

Lind was traded for minor-league pitchers Dennis Moeller and Joel Johnston.

Moeller, 25, was 8-5 with two saves and a 2.46 ERA in 23 appearances, 16 starts, for Triple-A Omaha.

Johnston, a 25-year-old right-hander, was 5-2 with two saves and a 6.39 ERA in 42 relief appearances for Omaha.

► SNYDER HONORED

Senior punter Sean Snyder was chosen Thursday to the third team All-American by Football News magazine.

The son of K-State coach Bill Snyder is currently ranked fourth in the nation with an average punt of 46.5 yards. With two games left, Snyder is a candidate to break the 1982 college season-average record of 45.8 yards by Jayhawk Bucky Scribner.

Until now, Snyder had 25 punts over 50 yards with the longest at 64 yards, 15 of which went into the 20-yard zone.

overlook anybody, as the loss to Mizzou proved.

"We played emotionally flat, that's not what we try to do here. We have to play harder," he said. "They are ready to play. Their quarterback, when he is on, he's on. We just know we have to pump on defense."

Cowboy quarterback Gary Porter threw for 116 yards during the 15-15 tie last week against state rival Oklahoma. The freshman now has 1,160 yards on the season, good for 15th in the Cowboys' record books. He needs 118 more to become No. 14 — which currently is Jack Hartman, former K-State basketball coach.

Oklahoma State's rise toward the upper half in the conference hasn't gone unnoticed by Snyder.

"They are a pretty good football team," Snyder said. "Offensively, they get better and better with the year. They went through personnel changes and finally got to where they wanted to be."

"I think they play hard, they play with emotions. They are getting better. You can see it day in, day out."

And K-State's players know this Oklahoma State team is able to beat the Cats if K-State doesn't fight for every inch. Oklahoma State's tie last week is the best example.

"I thought Oklahoma State had a chance to beat the Sooners," Barta said. "I knew they played good football."

Fans' actions a concern for some

"But if I received a report through channels, I would be extremely disappointed in our fans," he said.

The student who was dressed as Willie confirmed the incident.

"It all stemmed from an incident where two of their cheerleaders tackled me," he said. "I didn't mean any harm by it. I didn't know it (the purse) was in the bag. I just assumed it was cheerleader stuff."

The Cyclone cheerleaders ended up being escorted off the field by security officers before the game was over.

"The fans that were throwing things weren't watching the game, and we thought it would be better," DeReu said.

"We basically felt it was the worst set of fans we've been involved with."

At the conclusion of the game, a goal post was ripped down by fans who ran onto the field. The Riley County Ambulance Service confirmed they treated one injury related to the incident.

K-State coach Bill Snyder said he was disappointed by the goal post incident.

"I want us to be over that hump," he said. "I'd like to think that there's enough respect for the program right now that you can take those victories and be happy with them."

K-State wide receiver Gerald Benton said he didn't understand the reasoning of the fans.

"We got back to the locker room and heard that they were ripping down the goal posts. Why? It was a big win on ESPN, and we were coming off a month of losing, but it wasn't a game that put us over the top or one that we dominated."

"My little brother watched it on TV and called me after the game and asked me why it happened. He said, 'You guys didn't play well. I'd be pissed at you all.'"

K-State Police Chief Charles Beckom said the consumption of alcohol during the games has become a large factor in the problems at the stadium.

"You really have two events occurring," he said. "One is the event itself, and the other is a contest to see who can get plastered the quickest."

"Crowd attitude has changed in the last few years. There's been more of a tendency toward violence. There's no way that 15 or 16 people total can control or eliminate that."

University policy does not allow possession or consumption of alcohol at KSU Stadium or in the parking lot. Chuck Reagan, assistant to the president, said the problem is enforcing the policy at winter games.

"Control in Bramlage (Coliseum) is a lot easier. But when you've got 25,000 people showing up 15 minutes before game time with coats on, it can become difficult. That doesn't mean that we condone it."

"We have not received a single phone call about the game, but if it is a problem, we'll do something about it."

Regents get ready to review university on new mission and role in the regents system.

That would result in a review of programs by the regents and administrators. Some may be discontinued starting in February.

The board would review the schools' work in November 1993.

"It may be three or four years before we see all of this happen," said Regent Jack Sampson of Hutchinson.

The proposal for state financing linked to the performance of regents universities also was a response to legislative pressure.

Under the concept, each school would set goals — such as graduating a certain percentage of its freshmen in four years — then get extra money if they are met.

But more specific proposals ran into opposition from university administrators as a regents task force considered the idea.

Palmer said university officials were worried about how goals would be set and whether financing would be based on the goals, rather than the results. She also said some of them were worried about centralizing power in the regents' office.

programs and keep people coming to K-State.

"Human ecology is definitely not a 'Mrs.' degree anymore," she said. "We're a very strong college now."

Dennis Kuhlman, professor of agricultural engineering and chairman of the Provost's Committee for Role and Aspirations, said the budget for the changes will come from each college.

"When the college core groups of the different colleges went through the process of evaluating their colleges, there was the assumption that any changes were to come out of their own budgets," he said.

Stowe said she didn't know how the changes would affect the college's budget.

"I can't say how much this will cost us because everything is in proposal right now, and changes are constantly being made," she said.

"If I told you what I thought it would cost, I would be just pulling numbers out of the air."

The mission statement of the college states: "The mission of the College of Human Ecology is to provide a research base and professional preparation for the comprehensive study of humans as social beings, the nature of their physical, social, economic and psychological environments, and the interaction between humans and their environments."

Changes are made in the college, Stowe said, to keep it in a position to better serve people its mission statement states.

"We must more accurately prepare our graduates," she said.

"If we do not offer something a student is interested in, we will work with them so they are able to get it."

is approved by faculty in the student's curriculum," Akin said.

Program goals are to increase the number of students who participate in the program and expand cooperative education to a greater number of minority, underrepresented and disadvantaged students.

Other goals are to increase the number of employers who hire K-State students, he said, and support faculty involvement in supervising students in the program.

Akin said one benefit of the program is that it's paid, which reduces the amount of debt students have when they graduate.

Other benefits of the program, he said, are that participants have a more meaningful college experience and they have tremendous networking opportunities with professionals.

"The ultimate of all benefits is that students who have had experience bring their skill level and knowledge level at a point to compete better for postgraduate opportunities," Akin said.

Senate puts off fee bill by 20 universities, it was found that about one of every 400-500 students is HIV-positive.

"That means that most likely, there are 40-50 at K-State," Moeller said. "Most of them don't know that."

The Bramlage Coliseum fee continuance bill also was a heated topic during the meeting, and one that is not yet resolved. After a 37-10 vote on the bill, Senate passed another motion to reconsider it at the Dec. 3 meeting.

The students' part of Bramlage will be paid off at the end of this fiscal year. This bill would use $1 of the current full-time student fees being paid into the Coliseum Bond and redirect it into a Bramlage repair fund. It would also use 50 cents of part-time students' fees.

An amendment to the Educational Opportunity Fund allocation for fiscal year 1994 bill failed. The amendment would have appropriated an extra $619.84 for the Upward Bound summer program for minority high-school students, raising its funding from $4,688 to $5,308.

The motion failed after EOF Committee guidelines were discussed. The guidelines do not allow for any increases over last year's allocations. The original bill passed easily.

Each year, 1 percent of the tuition paid by K-State students is returned to the University for the EOF. This usually amounts to about $240,000. That money is then used to fund programs on campus.

Large homes roasting on wild open fires, Jack Frost...

Last year's uncontrollable blaze that swept through Oakland, Calif., left 25 people dead and more than 5,000 homeless.

So, it seems obvious that the most sensitive thing for a film producer to do would be to return to the same area, build mock homes, and set them on fire before the eyes of the survivors of the tragedy.

That's what the producers for the ABC made-for-TV movie "Firestorm" did, and now residents of ritzy Oakland Hills are outraged.

There's nothing like re-traumatization to really get the neighborhood excited and supportive of your Hollywood project.

"Cut! That's a wrap! Hey, who's got my pacifier?"

It's time to dig out those old 8-mm reels that your dad shot. You know, the ones where you're 6 years old at the Grand Canyon, picking your nose the entire time.

The Second Annual Kan Film Festival has been announced. And on Saturday, June 5, 1993, all the great filmmakers of the Sunflower and Show-Me states will gather, chat amiably, then glare at each other resentfully from across the room.

The four levels of competition allow all residents of Kansas and Missouri to compete in the categories of Drama/Comedy, Documentary and Original.

For more info, write the Kansas Film Commission, 700 SW Harrison St., #1300, Topeka, Kan., 66603-3712.

But wait, there's more.

In an effort to "grow their own filmmakers," the festival has included a Primary Division open to students in grades 1-8.

Weekend envisions a stunning remake of "Citizen Kane" starring Miss Jones' entire second-grade class, directed by little Tommy Brady, who spends nap time eating glue.

It's time to suffer for someone else's art

Here are some miscellaneous, but important, notes for those of you eager to catch up with the world of art and literature.

First, a warm, some would even say stifling, congratulations to K-State's very own Elizabeth Dodd, professor of English.

Professor Dodd is the recipient of the concisely-dubbed Elmer Holmes Bobst Award in Arts and Letters for Emerging Writers. The award is granted for her first collection of poetry, "Like Memory, Caverns," and will be presented to her at New York University on Dec. 9.

Second, Weekend suggests, nay, urges you, to make the quick drive up to Omaha, Neb., in order to catch the "Annie Leibovitz Photographs 1970-1990" exhibit at the Joslyn Art Museum. This is the first museum exhibition of the amazing photographer who captured such stunning photographs for magazines like Rolling Stone and Vanity Fair.

The exhibit runs through Jan. 3, 1993, so we don't want to hear any complaints about not having enough time.

Third, and closer to home, the Eighth Annual Holiday Tree Lighting Ceremony at the Nelson-Atkins Museum of Art in Kansas City, Mo., will be at 3 p.m. Saturday, Dec. 5.

The Kansas City Chorale and the 18th-century Neapolitan creche will be there, as well as the 22-foot tree wrapped in thousands of white lights.

One anniversary that we wish would have never occurred.

On the 20th of November, 1917, near the small French town of Cambrai, more than 370 tanks spearheaded a furious push on the immovable German Hindenburg Line.

By the time the sun had reached its apex, the tanks had overrun several trench lines and had penetrated as deep as 5 miles into enemy territory.

There you have it. Today is the 75th anniversary of the first full-scale use of the tank. Hurling masses of metal and firepower, tanks were first used in limited numbers at the Battle of Flanders-Coudelette during the Somme offensive. After this event, and until the Battle at Cambrai, the untested tanks compiled a record of successes and failures.

Beyond the insanity of war, the tank was the necessary fulcrum that put an end to the torturous stalemate of the Western Front and led to the end of World War I.

Apart from this fact, Weekend can't think of any other reason to note this occasion. Unless you count that James Garner movie...

FLANNEL

STORY BY THE COLLEGIAN STAFF DESIGN BY DEANNA ADAMS

Imagine driving into an unfamiliar community and suddenly seeing wooden light posts. And something very odd is encasing those posts.

It's warm, it's celebrated and it's everywhere.

Flannel.

The abundance and popularity of flannel wear can be seen every day as the weather creeps into the winter months.

This year is different, however, as flannel sales have skyrocketed from the demand for a warm, colorful alternative to sweaters.

Flannel was originally used for making pajamas, then work shirts, stereotypically for lumberjacks or truck drivers.

Now J. Crew sells flannels. For a ridiculous price of $50.

If that isn't expensive enough, try a flannel Polo by Ralph Lauren — $80. An employee at Lowman's Men's Store in Aggieville said the store's flannel sales have increased, and 90 percent of them are Polo.

On the cheaper side, flannels of all kinds can be found at Plainsman Farm and Home Supplies for $10 to $20.

An employee at Wal-Mart said flannel sales have increased because of cold weather. The cheapest flannel sold there is $6.46.

One small town really knows its flannel. Red flannel.

Cedar Springs, Mich., is the red-flannel capital of the United States. Its slogan,

"You'll receive a welcome as warm as our red flannels," reiterates the town's pride in red-flannel production.

In 1936, a New York journalist bemoaned the fact that in the middle of "the worst winter in years" there were no red flannels to go with it.

The editors of Cedar Springs' local newspaper wrote an editorial in reply stating that "Just because Sak's Fifth Avenue does not carry red flannels, it doesn't follow that no one in the country does. Cedar Springs' merchants have red flannels!"

Red flannels made history for Cedar Springs.

The story caught fire, and orders for red flannels poured in from all over the United States.

Heightened publicity prompted a "Red Flannel Day" and celebration for the fall of 1939. Since then, it has become an annual event on the first Saturday of October.

The town's tradition stuck, and the state accepts the phrase "red flannel" as a copyright within Cedar Springs.

The community of 2,700 is serious about the stuff.

There are "red flannel" car washes, restaurants, factories, insurance agencies and Christmas-tree farms.

To residents, it's not an underwear festival, but a time for family, fun and curiosity of what the festival will hold — especially for the 35,000 people who attend every year.

"People from all over the Midwest and Canada come to the festival every year because it's so much fun, and there is a lot to do," said Linda Hunt, director of the Red Flannel festival.

Strangers to the area are welcomed to the festival by a wooden light post draped in red flannel.

The festival attracts many by the abundance of arts and crafts and individual interests.

Other favorite attractions are the Lumberjack supper and the Keystone Kop jail.

The jail is for those who are "arrested offenders" for not wearing enough red for the festival. To be bailed out, prisoners must pay $1. The proceeds support festival activities.

The festival is in downtown Cedar Springs, and with an attendance ranging from 28,000 to 40,000, it can get a little cramped.

"We use the school facilities, main streets, parking lots. Last year we started using the college campus for our new fine arts show. A lot of people come purely out of curiosity — to see why we celebrate this every year," Hunt said.

Jump on the flannel bandwagon, whether it's red, blue or green. It's clothing adaptable to everyone's tastes, expensive or inexpensive.

Confusing plot of 'Waterland' blurs powerful story

Despite strong direction, diverse plots fail to connect

ASSOCIATED PRESS

The Fens are ancient lands of the East Anglia coast of England, reclaimed from the North Sea over the centuries and maintained in modern times by a system of dikes, pumps and streams.

Its bleak, soggy landscape is ideal for a gothic tale in the manner of Thomas Hardy.

"Waterland" is such a story as seen through the eyes of teen-age Tom (Grant Warnock) in wartime. He lives in a gatehouse with his taciturn father and hulking, slow-witted brother.

Tom discovers sex with the wild-spirited Mary (Lena Headey), and they meet regularly in an abandoned windmill. But Tom's family is haunted by an ominous and hidden past, involving his imperious grandfather, who was a vengeful beer baron, and the boy's dead mother.

The Fenland drama climaxes in death and abortion.

This story alone would be sufficient for powerful drama. But layered over it is a confusing, unconvincing plot told in the present by the grownup Tom.

Portrayed by Jeremy Irons, Tom is now a middle-aged history teacher in an American high school. He is married to Mary, who is bitterly unhappy.

She announces she is pregnant, even though she and Tom know she cannot bear children.

Realizing that his students are bored, Tom occupies his class with his childhood saga, complete with his sexual awakening. Thus the Fenland story is related in flashback.

The students are embarrassed and unbelieving, and the cynical Matthew (Ethan Hawke) challenges the teacher's veracity.

Peter Prince, who adapted the acclaimed novel of Graham Swift, provided the brilliant device of having Tom lead his students into his former life as a kind of time-warp field trip.

They visit the past events and places, traveling in a vintage touring car. An intriguing trick, but not enough to overcome the incompatibility of the two diverse storylines.

Steven Gyllenhaal directs both stories with surety and imagination, but he is unable to make them merge into a coherent whole. The final resolution to the turbulent events seems excessively Hollywood.

Irons portrays the deeply troubled Tom with restraint and conviction, and Sinead Cusack (Irons' wife) gives dimension to the enigmatic Mary.

'Open' relationship is not all it's cracked up to be

YOU'RE ASKING ME?

by Cassandra Duveaux

DEAR CASSANDRA,
I never thought I would write to you, but it appears I have a little problem.
A few weeks ago I ran into an old friend. She said it was good to see me and that we should go out sometime. We went out, and I found out she still had a boyfriend. But she wanted to be out with me. She has what she called an "open" relationship with her boyfriend, who she says allows her to see other people.
Well, to be blunt, we had sex. Now, unlike some of the others who have written in, I told her I was not looking for a relationship before we had sex. She said she understood and she still wanted to be with her boyfriend, but she wanted to have sex with me.

We've been together for sex a few times. Each time, I told her I did not want to get serious. She said OK. Now I'm starting to feel bad for her boyfriend. I don't understand how he could deal with it.
When I'm in a relationship, I want to see only that woman, and I want her to see only me. She calls on a regular basis and comes over frequently.
To be honest, sex isn't all that important to me. I am more interested in (some)one's mind. Don't get me wrong — sex is fun, but not predominant in my mind.

I've come to a decision in this mess that I have gotten in, but I would like to hear what you would recommend to a fool like me.
The Tragic Comic
Assuming the "open" relationship is true, the boyfriend is the least of your worries. An "open" relationship in the '90s is an "open" invitation to death. This arrangement you have is, indeed, foolish.
Obviously, your original ground rule on not getting serious has been violated. As I see it, you need to give Ms. "Free love" an ultimatum: break off her dangerous liaisons with you, or make a more permanent commitment to you — meaning, leave the boyfriend.

However, you need to keep this in mind: If she was willing to have an "open" relationship with her boyfriend, she may also decide to have one with you as well — behind your back. I am afraid that is what she is probably already doing with her boyfriend.

Bush's mother dies reunion of all five of her children at the family compound in Kennebunkport, Maine.

Gathered with President Bush were his sister, Nancy Ellis, and brothers Prescott Jr., Jonathan and William "Bucky" Bush.

"Everyone in this family — young and old, direct and indirect relations — looks up to her," the president said.

"I have a feeling that that's still true in a lot of families in this country."

Dorothy Bush was born July 1, 1901, in Kennebunkport, a daughter of wealthy Midwestern businessman George Herbert Walker and Lulie Wear Walker.

Walker, an avid athlete, established the Walker Cup, given each year since 1923 in a competition for American and Great Britain's top amateur golfers.

She grew up in St. Louis and attended the Farmington School Academy, a prep school in Farmington, Conn.

She and Prescott Bush, a financier and businessman, were married in 1921.

Prescott Bush eventually entered politics, serving in the U.S. Senate 1952-1963. He died in 1972.

In an article he wrote for the Greenwich Time newspaper, President Bush said: "Every mother has her own style. My mother's was a little like an Army drill sergeant's."

"Dad was the commanding general, make no mistake about that, but Mother was the one out there day in and day out, shaping the troops."

Dorothy Bush guarded against her children becoming too self-important, despite their wealth.

The president recalled in his autobiography his mother continued to warn him about bragging even when he was running for national office.

She would also criticize her son's deportment when he was vice president, reminding him to be more courteous toward his wife in public.

Bush said he heeded his mother's advice.

Fitzwater said private funeral services will be Monday morning in Greenwich.

deficit," Clinton said.

"I think if we work hard at it, we can have bipartisan cooperation."

He sought to balance such optimism with a reminder that some problems facing the country are of mind-bending complexity.

"The sense I get from the American people is ... they don't expect miracles of us, but they do expect progress," Clinton said.

To court Congress, he had meals with legislators and a handful of private meetings with senior legislators from both parties.

Clinton said his challenge was "to present a credible program and work with them and meet them halfway."

Leaders from both parties said they shared his hope for bipartisanship.

"I'd give him credit for being realistic," said Senate Republican leader Bob Dole, noting that Clinton stressed economic stimulus would have to be balanced with deficit reduction.

Clinton said he hoped to encourage quick passage of his economic stimulus package by getting it to Congress by the time he takes office in January so problems could be addressed quickly.

And he said he came away from Capitol Hill convinced he could reach agreement with Congress on a health-care plan that cut costs, reforms the insurance industry and provides coverage to all.

Dole nodded in agreement as Clinton said: "No one seriously believes that we will ever get the deficit under control until we adopt a system which brings health-care costs under control that are both privately and publicly funded."

LONDON LECTURE

Shaw sounds off against sexism

CRAIG HACKER/Collegian

Bernard Shaw, principle Washington, D.C., anchor for the Cable News Network, speaks to a full house about discrimination against women in the United States during the 93rd Landon Lecture Friday at McCain Auditorium.

"Sexism is a poison we have been drinking for too long."

CNN anchor addresses University

JULIE LONG

America cannot win the fight for economic superiority if attitudes about women are not changed, CNN Washington anchor Bernard Shaw said.

"We in this great country are not putting on the field all of our players. Nor are all those players being rewarded fairly. We cannot win this fight if we do not change our attitude about women," he said.

Shaw presented the 93rd Landon Lecture before a capacity crowd Friday morning in McCain Auditorium.

He said in the future, people will look back on this culture and ask: "Why weren't those Americans as fierce and as passionate about their greatest resource, their people? Especially why, why did they abuse women, in principle and in fact?"

"Sexism is a poison we have been drinking for too long," he said.

REDEFINING K-STATE ACADEMICS

K-State-Salina proposes merger

Low enrollment in two programs cited

ANDY WOODWARD
Collegian

EDITOR'S NOTE: The Kansas Board of Regents has called for new Role and Aspirations Statements from each state university. This is the sixth story in a series on what K-State's colleges are doing to fulfill this mandate.

The College of Technology at K-State-Salina is proposing that two departments be absorbed into other departments.

The industrial engineering technology department will be included in the chemical engineering technology department. The computer engineering technology department will merge with the electronic engineering technology department.

One reason for the proposed mergers is the low number of students in each program, K-State-Salina Associate Dean Jerry Cole said.

"What we found is that if you look at the numbers in industrial and the numbers in chemical, maybe one to three students per semester are affected in chemical, and maybe one or two in industrial," Cole said.

"Industrial never really took off like it should have."

"In chemical, in the five years I've been here, we've graduated maybe 15-20 students. It's just not feasible to keep."

Another reason for the combination is the number of classes the disciplines have in common, Dean Jack Henry said.

"With this proposal in Role and Aspirations, we eliminated the programs as a degree, but we still offer the same courses as an option in the existing programs," Henry said.

"You won't get a degree, but you can get all the classes."

One theme of the reorganization is efficiency.

"The merge allows the engineering college on the Manhattan campus to phase out the two programs while we are phasing them in in a different form," Cole said.

The first classes in the two departments, on a junior level, will be offered in the fall of 1993 on the Salina campus. The first graduation from the combined departments will be in the spring of 1995.

The mergers will serve both the wants of the students in the programs and the needs of the entire Salina campus, Cole said.

Tornadoes sweep South

ASSOCIATED PRESS
Collegian

A wall of thunderstorms pushing across the South spun tornadoes from Texas to Kentucky, killing 16 people, smashing houses and blowing trucks off highways.

Several states in the path of the storm were under tornado watches Sunday night.

Tornadoes killed 15 people and injured at least 150 in Mississippi late Saturday, and one person was killed early Sunday in Tennessee.

Texas and Louisiana were hit by tornadoes Saturday, with heavy damages and numerous injuries, but no deaths.

Thunderstorms and tornadoes wrecked homes and businesses in Alabama, Indiana and Georgia, where a steeple was ripped from a church during Sunday's service.

Among the hardest hit areas was in and around Brandon, Miss., where 10 people died.

"It's unbelievable. We're lucky we didn't lose more lives than we did," Brandon mayor W.L. Whittington said.

A tornado smashed through a mobile-home park and then skipped across Brandon to an upscale neighborhood, where it killed a father and son, along with two of the boy's Cub Scout buddies spending the night there.

At the mobile-home park, where six people died, rescue workers used doors from smashed houses as makeshift stretchers, said Charlie Wilkinson, civil defense director for Rankin County.

Gov. Kirk Fordice toured the Rankin County area about 15 miles east of Jackson. The storm hit about midnight, leveling houses, uprooting trees and downing hundreds of power and telephone poles.

FORT RILEY

Body, plane identified

Soldier reported missing since Nov. 3

SHAWN BRUCE
Collegian

Fort Riley officials have identified the body found in the wreckage of a plane crash as that of a missing Fort Riley soldier.

Pfc. Sam Thomas Patton, 21, of Odessa, Texas, had been reported absent without leave Nov. 3.

Patton had a pilot's license and had reportedly told friends he wanted to rent a plane to fly home.

Jeanette Krueger, Fort Riley public affairs spokeswoman, said military pathologists at Irwin

Army Community Hospital made the identification through dental records. Patton's body had been badly burned in the crash.

The wreckage and body were discovered by 1st Infantry Division soldiers Nov. 17 in a remote area of Fort Riley.

The site is a non-populated area used for maneuver training, Krueger said.

The $50,000 plane, a single-engine Piper Turbo Arrow, had been reported stolen from the Junction City airport on Oct. 30 or 31, Geary County Sheriff Bill Deppish said. The plane is owned by David Walker of Chapman.

Officials from the National Transportation Safety Board and the Federal Aviation Administration are investigating the crash.

BOARD OF REGENTS

Role and Aspirations timetable set

Future teachers will need higher grades, test scores, regents say

SHAWN BRUCE
Collegian

A timetable for implementing changes proposed in K-State's Role and Aspirations statement highlighted Thursday's Board of Regents meeting.

The board also approved higher admittance standards for teacher education programs.

All Kansas regent schools submitted final Role and Aspirations statements, and the board will begin analysis immediately. Action will be taken on the mission and role segments at the December meeting, Provost Jim Coffman said.

In February, the board will review aspiration statements, and after making any needed changes, will authorize K-State to proceed with internal procedures to cut programs.

The biggest change proposed at K-State is the elimination of the speech pathology program. Coffman said all students currently enrolled will be able to complete their degrees.

In November 1993, the board will hear reports from all regent schools on progress toward fulfilling their role and aspiration statements.

The timetable is an ambitious one, Coffman said.

"It's going to be difficult to do," he said. "We have a lot of procedures to follow."

Both Regent Jack Sampson and Coffman said they believe full

Because students are more comfortable talking to their peers about rape than professional counselors, K-State is looking into a peer-educator program.

Laura Hacquard, coordinator of the Women's Center at the University of Missouri, talked to potential peer coordinators Wednesday afternoon in Holton Hall.

Her workshop was the fourth in a series to educate K-State students about a campus peer program, which is designed to train students to talk to other students about rape.

Hacquard pointed out that these students are not trained to be counselors, but as educators who raise awareness of rape and the help available to victims.

"There is a very fine line between educating and counseling," she said.

Judy Davis, director of K-State's Women's Resource Center, said she hoped K-State would have people trained as peer educators in time for the spring semester.

Hacquard said MU has had a peer program for seven years, and it has grown considerably since its beginning.

She said her program has gone from 30 classes that reached 400 people in the first year to more than 300 classes reaching 7,000.

It's the students in the program who make the difference, she said.

"I know I would a lot rather talk to someone close to my own age," Hacquard said.

She said resistance to such programs is not uncommon among university officials, so her staff used a gradual approach at Missouri.

Peer educators now put on a program every year as part of a summer welcome program, Hacquard said, and about 85 percent of incoming students attend.

"When I used to do the program, I felt like the students perceived me as a parent. Now the peers do it, and I think they are much more effective," she said.

Hacquard said she thinks the peer program is making a difference on the Missouri campus, even in the actual cases of rape.

She also said changes in numbers are hard to measure because many rapes still go unreported.

"Our sense is that more people are getting some kind of help, which is one of our most important goals," she said.

Seven of the 35 peer educators are men, Hacquard said, and about 25 percent of the program's audiences are men.

She said peers are involved in other aspects of rape awareness, such as research or helping answer phones at the women's center.

Hacquard said she wanted the program to belong to the students.

"They're the ones that are out there every day, and they can make the difference," she said.

Rebecca Carney, graduate student in student counseling/personal services and assistant director of WRC, said she knew of about 20 students who are interested in starting a similar program.

Carney said the MU program would serve as a model for the program she would head here.

'Fiddler' portrays traditional play roles

Tevye, right, cringes as the tailor asks to marry his daughter, Tzeitel, the morning after he had promised her hand to another man. The scene was part of 'Fiddler on the Roof' Sunday night in McCain Auditorium.

Show's professionalism, visual effects add to success

ANDY WOODWARD
Collegian

Tevye, a poor milkman, struggles to keep his lifestyle and family intact against the forces of time and politics in "Fiddler on the Roof," performed Sunday night in McCain Auditorium.

The show was staged by The Troika Organization, a professional traveling company, and the professionalism showed.

The late Zero Mostel, who played the original Tevye on Broadway, once said Tevye could find some lows in every high and find a reason to be cynical when faced with good fortune.

John Preece, who played Tevye, fulfilled this original intent to the letter. Preece could find brevity in despair, depression in happiness, and he conveyed these emotions well to the audience.

Preece's Tevye had a rapport with the viewers, and Tevye's plights of poverty and the depth of his faith were not wasted on the McCain patrons.

Sammy Davis Bayes, production director and choreographer, also helped with the dancing in the film version of "Fiddler," and the revival on Broadway.

Bayes' choreography in Sunday night's "Fiddler" was nothing short of show-stopping. The ethnic dances and the wedding festivities add an invaluable element of realism to the show.

The choreography in "To Life," the celebration of one of Tevye's daughter's engagement, was even enough to attract the attention of the students who had to be there for a theater class, whose eyes had been glued to their programs and the clock.

The show's highlight was the dream sequence in which Tevye attempts to guile his wife into accepting their daughter's marriage to a poor tailor by feigning a nightmarish visitation from her dead grandmother, Fruma-Sarah.

The 8-foot Fruma-Sarah, played by Liz McDonald (on someone's shoulders), comes on stage sporting

KANSAS LIVESTOCK

Alumni glad to fill 'thankless' positions

LANE ALLISON
Collegian

Gov. Joan Finney has honored two K-State alumni by appointing them to the Kansas Animal Health Board.

Mike Brose of Valley Falls and Lance Rezac of Onaga are both graduates of the College of Agriculture.

Ella Spizey, Kansas Animal Health Department office supervisor, said the board is an advisory group that assists the Kansas livestock commissioner in Topeka.

She said members make recommendations on the department budget as well as the overall progress of the department, and they oversee the hiring and firing of the livestock commissioner.

Rezac is serving as president of Kansas Young Farmers. He farms south of Onaga with his father and brother — Rezac Land and Livestock. He received his bachelor's in agricultural mechanization in 1983.

Rezac said he believes in the Kansas farmer and the importance of agriculture to this state.

"I have a real strong belief in agriculture, and I want to do everything I can to help with Kansas agriculture," he said.

Rezac also said he has high regards for K-State.

"I'm really glad to have been part of K-State. They teach you how diverse agriculture is. Through college, you learn how big the world is and how little you really know about it," he said.

Brose is general manager and president of Sunrise Stock Farm, a 2,000-acre farm, ranch and dairy operation in Valley Falls. He received his bachelor's in agricultural economics in 1979.

Brose said he was excited to be appointed to the board.

"From what I understand, it's a thankless position," he said. "You don't get paid, and nobody really knows you do it. But I think it's important to keep the quality of agriculture in Kansas high, and I think it will be a good experience for me," Brose said.

"What I did at K-State did a lot to help me in what I've done in my life," he said. "I still support the College of Agriculture through monetary contributions."

Auction doubles Big Lakes' success

SCOTT OBERKROM
Collegian

The halls of Colony Square were filled with Christmas trees for Big Lakes Developmental Center Inc.'s seventh annual Festival of Trees Friday and Saturday.

The Festival is designed to raise money to help benefit developmentally disabled and mentally retarded adults and children in Riley, Geary, Clay and Pottawatomie counties, by auctioning donated items.

There were over 60 items donated for the auction this year, including decorated Christmas trees and a trip to Las Vegas.

"Our goal was to raise $15,000," said Ileen Adams, Public Relations Supervisor for Big Lakes. "I think that we made over two times as much as last year."

The fundraiser earned $10,000 in 1991.

Friday evening, a special V.I.P. Night was held with silent bidding on all items. The highest bid determined the opening bid for Saturday's public auction.

"It was a good idea for the V.I.P. night. It gets the starting bid up," said Len Ward, one of the donors.

Past festivals have not appealed to the general public, due in large part to the cost of the items being auctioned, Adams said.

"In years past, John Q. Public could not have participated," she said.

In order to attract wider support, festival officials added

Money key to winning election

THE ISSUE

A number of new and re-elected senators won more money than their opponents to win.

WE SUGGEST

Election seasons need to be shorter and campaign donations need to be monitored.

After it was all said and done, five women were elected to the U.S. Senate. Unfortunately, the size of their purses may have had more to do with their success than the fact that they carry purses.

Though this may be dubbed a "historic election year," it was still one guided by the almighty pocketbook.

Figures from the group Common Cause, an organization seeking to have taxpayers finance congressional races, reveal a trend of heavy spending for the winners in this month's elections.

The tentative results are as follows:

In California, Democrat Dianne Feinstein spent $6.7 million. Republican Sen. John Seymour spent $5.9 million. Feinstein won. In Pennsylvania, Republican Sen. Arlen Specter spent $8.4 million. Democrat Lynn Yeakel spent $4 million. Specter was re-elected.

In eight close Senate races, the incumbents' combined expenditures were $49.5 million. The challengers shelled out $19.6 million. Each of the incumbents was victorious.

Only 16 percent of the 110 new House members had to defeat an incumbent to win their seats. Also, incumbent congressmen had an average of $626,711 to spend. Challengers stumbled along with an average of $112,383 in their coffers.

It's obvious a better way is needed to get people into Congress. People qualified by their talents and experience. Not because they have plenty of cash to spread around.

Cutting the campaign season would be a good start.

Close monitoring of campaign donations surely couldn't hurt.

Readers misconstrue columnist's beliefs

I am disturbed by the recent false allegations regarding my beliefs about women. Perhaps readers concluded that because I am a male, a Republican and a Christian, it follows that I must be a chauvinist pig as discussed in Susan Feludi's chapter about the "New Right" in her book, "Backlash."

To begin, I didn't write the headline "Feminists directly responsible for the family downfall," and I disagree with it. Feminism is only one of a complex set of factors that has contributed to the breakdown of the family.

I support many equal-opportunity initiatives for women, including equal pay for equal work. Also, I have no problem with women pursuing careers in law, business or any other allegedly "male-dominated" profession.

The issue of submissiveness, in particular, warrants further discussion. Evidently, many readers had a concept of submissiveness in mind that I was not advocating in any way.

Many men in our culture have falsely taken the idea of submissiveness as a mandate to treat their wives as waitresses and slaves. Some men have thought their wives should submit to abuse and mistreatment. I abhor these actions, and they have no foundation in the biblical model of marriage.

Let this be clear: Women submitting to men in marriage is not a mandate for men to oppress women in society at large.

Also, my definition of submission does not come from Webster's Dictionary but from the Bible and more specifically, Greek. The word "submit" in Greek does not even hint at a superior/inferior relationship; rather, it denotes a voluntary relinquishing of one's will for the good of a group. In this case, the marriage partnership.

The rarely quoted verse directly before "Wives, submit to your husbands as to the Lord" verse reads, "Submit to one another out of reverence for Christ." This verse means that each partner in a relationship should have a conciliatory attitude denoted by selfless giving.

A later verse reads, "Husbands, love your wives." Love is not self-seeking, as defined in I Corinthians 13. Therefore, a loving husband will not pursue his own interests but those of his wife. This type of love is the husband's act of submission.

The wife's specific act of submission involves submitting to her husband as to the Lord. "For the husband is the head of the wife as Christ is the head of the church..." Ephesians 5:23.

The model of marriage I advocate is marked by mutual giving and sacrifice where both partners are equal in worth but different in roles. John Schwartz, a personal friend, provides an excellent analogy for this model marriage in a letter to the editor that wasn't printed.

"A marriage is like a quarterback-receiver relationship where the QB calls the plays, but if the receiver tells him of an opening in the defense, the QB gladly works to exploit that opening. Why? Because they're a team, striving toward the same goal.

"A wise husband knows that his wife is able to see many things he can't from his male perspective, so his wife's opinion is priceless."

The reason wives should submit as defined by the biblical model of marriage is because women are inherently different from men, and those differences dispose women to be better suited to submit in a marriage. It's very difficult to empirically prove that men and women are inherently different. It's just as difficult to prove otherwise.

Furthermore, few feminists would ever admit to any inherent differences. To do so would undermine much of their philosophy. Deep down, I will venture a guess that most of us can identify something within us that is either masculine or feminine.

Finally, I support your right to call me a sexist and a bigot. If that is your conclusion, please base it on what I actually believe and not what you think I believe.

MARK ENGLER

Finding a real truth in 'Malcolm X'

This film is about a man driven to the brink of destruction by oppression.

I've heard a number of white people say they really want to see Spike Lee's film, "Malcolm X." But that they want to wait — wait for all the "radicals" (buzzword for black people maybe?) to see it first. Presumably so their cinematic experience will be more comfortable — free from any tension or guilt that might cut into an otherwise enjoyable evening of popcorn munching and escapism.

However, if those aspects of movie-going are what you're looking for, perhaps you should see something else. I think "Captain Ron" is still at the Campus Theater.

Lee's movie is not enjoyable — at least not in the traditional sense of the word. And it's not about escaping reality, either.

It's about wallowing in it.

If ever there was a great American leader, portrayed in a great American film, "Malcolm X" is the equivalent.

Before this film's release, the media engaged in some moderate Spike Lee bashing. Stories appeared in national news magazines, such as Newsweek, suggesting Lee was an egotistical opportunist with certain disregard for history. Much in the same way Oliver Stone was described after making "JFK."

Must be that damn liberal media again, ain't that right Billy-Bob?

But Lee is one step ahead of critics on this one.

Where Stone ran into a brick wall over the fact that "recorded history" and "official accounts" contradicted his claims in "JFK," Lee's film is successful regardless of historical accuracy.

That is because Lee's film wouldn't have to be a perfectly factual account of a human being's life in order to be hugely compelling.

This film is about a man driven to the brink of destruction by oppression.

Anyone want to argue that has never happened in the United States?

Even though the hate against him could have, and probably did, sow the seeds of hate within his own heart, he never lashed out against his oppressor in a violent, hedonistic desire for vengeance. Ever.

Rather, he harnessed that anger — anger the affluent ruling class will never know — and used it to try to uplift his people, and ultimately humankind as a whole.

That sure sounds a lot like the "pull-yourself-up-by-your-bootstraps" philosophy conservatives love to embrace... in theory.

Not to suggest all conservatives are racists and bigots, but why do racists and bigots always seem to be conservatives?

When it became apparent to Malcolm that he had been betrayed by those closest to him, his own people, he again turned not to violence and brutish vengeance, but instead broadened both his message and his humanity.

This man, be he fictional or factual, did not take the violent path. The logical path. The normal path. The path that, in taking a long look at today's screaming world, is the path many are taking.

Malcolm X's forced voyage into the soul-grinder of racism and hate left him with all the markings of a man destined to hate back. What resulted in him though, through his perseverance and his deeply spirited desire for freedom, was a true understanding of the brutality and destruction that hate provokes. The only thing Malcolm X — El-Hajj Malik El-Shabazz — hated, was hate itself.

Spike Lee, whose views I have sometimes disagreed with, has done this country a patriotic service by creating this film. A truly patriotic service.

And, even if Spike Lee completely made-up in his own mind a fictional hero and called that fictional character "Malcolm X," I would still feel the same way.

See this film before attention moves away from it. See it soon.

Letter's meaning lost in word hacking

Editor,

You made an error in my letter in the Nov. 17 Collegian.

I am embarrassed and angry because of your disregard for my viewpoint. I understand that the Collegian reserves the right to edit pieces for the sake of clarification.

However, when you edited my letter you changed its meaning and my intent. I believe "Just Guys" can serve a great need by being a group for men, to be attended by men.

That point was cut out of my letter in the interest of "clarity." My point was lost and the point you were trying to make was very clear.

Your disregard for my intelligence caused me to hurt many individuals who are close to me.

BLOODMOBILE

Giving a pint is like saving someone's life

Editor,

Thanks to all the blood donors and volunteer staff who helped at the recent bloodmobile visit. "Because of you, hospital patients are receiving the blood they need to live," noted Diane Kaiura, Bloodmobile chairperson, who coordinated the campaign. A total of 83 donations were received.

Each donation helps insure that blood is available for hospital patients in this area when they need it, she said, reminding everyone that there is no substitute for life-saving blood. "Generous Fort Riley residents who shared their good health by giving blood now know what it feels like to save a life."

For those who were unable to give blood at the visit, the Red Cross bloodmobile will be in Fort Riley again on March 5, 1993.

ATHLETIC FEE

Fee, like it or not, is important to K-State

Editor,

In response to the Collegian Editorial Board's views on the Athletic Fee, I would like to set the record straight concerning the specifics of the bill. The Collegian breakdown of 11 percent to the band and 81 percent to all sports is not completely accurate.

The final version of the bill is as follows: KSU band: 13 percent; football: 8 percent; men's basketball: 8 percent; baseball: 6 percent; sports club council: 13 percent; women's volleyball: 15 percent; track: 10 percent; women's basketball: 15 percent; other non-revenue sports: 17 percent.

Additional provisions of the bill include a $7 cap per game on football tickets and $5 cap on basketball tickets. Non-traditional students enrolled at K-State would be able to purchase a Family Plan at a reduced rate of $5 per ticket per game. But could these provisions be perceived as true benefits to the student body?

The Editorial Board statement that "only a small percentage of students will benefit from the increase" represents a very narrow perspective. Whether we like it or not, athletics is big business and a major part of collegiate life. When the University of Miami is mentioned, a majority of us naturally think of football elitism. A minute portion of the population does know that besides football success, Miami has the premier Marine Science Department in the nation.

I ask this of the Editorial Board: Which question do you think has been asked more within the state of Kansas this fall? Who's going to start on Saturday, Garber or Smargiasso? Or, what's the name of KSU's latest Rhode Scholar? (No offense, Rhode Scholars.)

Have we forgotten that tax revenues from K-State athletics generate $4 million in the Manhattan community? Successful athletics can have as much as a 10-percent university-wide effect on recruitment. What about the Sports Illustrated article published on Aug. 31, 1992?

The Finance Committee played "hard ball" and arrived at an Athletic Fee beneficial to all parties. Whether we like it or not, in reality, a strong athletic department plays the foremost role in how a university is viewed. If it's the desire of the student body to have a referendum, remember a signed petition representing 5 percent of enrollment will force Student Senate to conduct a campus-wide referendum. All I ask is that arguments presented be realistic and true to the bill.

ATHLETIC FEE AGAIN

Vote was as close as editorial reported

Editor,

I found the Nov. 19 letter from faculty representative Phil Anderson to be extremely disappointing. In his attempt to correct the Collegian's Editorial Board, he only showed his ineptness at simple mathematics.

I would venture to say that the 70.9 percent in favor of the Athletic Fee increase is indeed a narrow margin over the 66.7 percent required for passage. Although the vote reflected substantial interest, it did "barely pass." Three votes made the difference.

I would like to say thanks to the board and the 55 senators voting for spending the time needed in hope of benefiting the student body. And I believe that enrollment for Math 101 is still open.

STUDENT SENATOR

It's your job to keep the students informed

Editor,

I would like to take the opportunity to thank Student Senator Darby Wallace for calling my attention to my ignorance in the Nov. 16 Collegian.

I would like to take the opportunity to correct my problem right now. To be blunt, exactly what is it that you people do and why do we need you to do it?

I and 20,000 other ignorant K-State students eagerly await your answer.

P.S. Wait a minute. Isn't part of your job keeping us informed?

COMMENTARY

Lafene's HIV testing one of the best programs going

This is to clarify and expand somewhat on the information contained in a letter to the Collegian from Jerrod Burns printed on Nov. 16.

Mr. Burns quotes the costs for HIV testing at Lafene Health Center ($28), Watkins Health Center, University of Kansas ($18.50) and the Riley County Health Department ($15). He writes that if Lafene would use the state lab as do Watkins and the health department, it would save K-State students money.

First and foremost, we thank and applaud Mr. Burns for his interest in and concern for the health and well-being of his brothers and sisters at K-State.

The state lab, operated by the state Department of Health and Environment, in actuality, only accepts HIV specimens for testing from county health departments and other affiliated labs via a specially sponsored program.

The Riley County Health Department and Watkins are among several special test sights for the program. As with any federally funded program, there are many constraints and regulations regarding staffing, special training, etc. including the anonymity of the patient. Watkins only makes this less-expensive avenue available one day per week.

It is our current understanding that the program is becoming very costly and that further constraints to participation, including the exclusion of "low risk" individuals, may be forthcoming.

With regard to costs, the price quoted for Watkins is only a partial quote. In HIV testing, an initial screening blood test is conducted. If that test indicates "positive," a second screen is conducted. If this is also positive, a third, more extensive "confirmatory" test is conducted.

When not utilizing the special government-sponsored program, Watkins charges $18.50 for the screens, but if the third test is indicated, they charge an additional $93. Lafene charges a flat $28 fee, which covers all three, if necessary. This practice keeps the price low if the third test is needed. As of July 1992, the screening test checks for both HIV-1 and HIV-2, both capable of causing AIDS.

There is no argument regarding the pricing at the health department. It is a public agency and has access to many "free" services that neither Lafene nor Watkins have available to them. "Free," as it must be remembered in this case, means taxpayer supported. There is nothing "free" — someone pays!

Addressing the issue of confidentiality is a little more difficult. I think there is some confusion between "confidentiality" and "anonymity."

Maintaining confidentiality means holding specific information secret or private and avoiding disclosure. Anonymity usually means not possessing the specific information in the first place. This is customarily accomplished using numbers or codes instead of names.

All patient care information at Lafene is kept confidential. In any health-care facility, there are several health professionals — laboratory technicians, physicians, nurses and others — who "need to know." They are, however, professionals in the true sense and know full well the importance of maintaining confidentiality.

Anonymity, on the other hand, is difficult and not necessarily wise in a physician-directed community health setting such as Lafene. Continuity of care, follow-ups and return visits require that patient information be entered into the patient's confidential medical record to be available to the health professional should the patient return for care.

Most students visiting Lafene for health care return many times for subsequent care. It is vitally important to the physician, nurse or other provider to have an adequate and comprehensive medical history at hand when working with the student-patient. Anonymity could be potentially detrimental to continued, ongoing care.

Students visiting Lafene who request HIV testing are advised of pricing and anonymity issues. And specifically due to the issue of cost, the patient is given the option of the confidential $28 test at Lafene or the $15 anonymous test at the Riley County Health Department. This option is presented after patient education and counseling regarding the individual's risk and the meaning of the test.

There is some question, however, as to whether state funds will continue to be used to test "low-risk" individuals. Lafene's cost of $28 is still less than the $40-$45 charged by other medical clinics in Manhattan.

The funds received by Lafene, through the student health fees and user fees, directly finance the annual operation of the health center. The center is financially sound. We have a financial reserve that exceeds that recommended by a student and faculty task force analyzing the center's operation in 1988.

To maintain our fiscal soundness, we operate on a strict budget and adhere to tight financial constraints. The fiscal year 1993 approved operating budget is $3,401,967.

Lafene is a sizable operation providing many health-care and health-promotion services. Between 300 and 400 students visit the center every week during the fall/spring semesters.

We are serving a community of nearly 20,000 "citizens." This requires an adequate staff and a variety of resources. We are, however, constantly aware of the need to conserve those resources and operate as efficiently as possible.

Lafene is the student's health center. We are open to and attempt to be responsive to our student community. However, any change in policy or operation in an organization the size of Lafene requires a great deal of thought to analyze the ramifications of those changes.

Lannie Zweimiller is the director of Lafene Health Center.

WEEKEND CONFERENCE REVIEW
BIG 8
CONFERENCE

► COLORADO 31 IOWA STATE 10

The No. 11 Colorado Buffaloes beat the Iowa State Cyclones for the ninth straight year and kept their chances of a trip to the Orange Bowl alive.

Buffalo quarterback Kordell Stewart completed 20 of 30 passes for 279 yards and set a new Colorado single-season passing record with 2,109 yards.

Colorado used two Iowa State turnovers in the first half to take a 28-3 halftime lead. The Buffs scored touchdowns on their first three possessions.

In the second half, Iowa State got within the Colorado 20-yard line twice, but failed on fourth-down conversions.

Colorado will take its third trip to the Orange Bowl in the last four years if Nebraska loses one of its two remaining games — at Oklahoma Nov. 27, or against K-State Dec. 5 in Tokyo. If the Cornhuskers win both games, Colorado will probably go to the Fiesta or Blockbuster Bowl.

Iowa State completed its season with a 4-7 record, including 2-5 in the Big Eight. Colorado finished its regular season at 9-1-1, 5-1-1 in the conference.

► MISSOURI 22 KANSAS 17

The Kansas Jayhawks continued their downward spiral with a loss to the Missouri Tigers.

The Jayhawks began their season by winning seven of their first eight games, but now, they have lost three straight.

Missouri place-kicker Jeff Jacke broke the Tigers' career scoring record as he booted five field goals. Jacke hit a 23-yard kick in the fourth quarter to put the Tigers in front 19-17.

Jayhawk quarterback Chip Hileary sustained a concussion during the first quarter and was replaced by sophomore backup Fredrick Thomas. Thomas completed only four passes in 19 attempts for 49 yards.

KU tailback Maurice Douglas picked up the slack by rushing for a career-high 180 yards and a touchdown on 31 carries.

Tiger quarterback Jeff Handy also set Missouri single-season records for passes, completions and yards. He completed 22 of 34 passes for 284 yards against KU.

Missouri wide receiver Victor Bailey caught 12 passes for 179 yards to become only the sixth Big Eight player to have 2,000 receiving yards in a career.

The Tigers had to battle through 116 yards in penalties for the win.

Missouri finished its season at 3-8, 2-5 in the Big Eight. The Tigers wrapped up their season with two straight wins for the first time since 1978.

The Hawks finished their regular season at 7-4, 4-3 in the Big Eight. They will most likely be invited to play in the Aloha Bowl in Hawaii.

Wildcats shut out Cowboys

FRANK KLEEMANN
Collegian

The last home game of the season Saturday for the Wildcats provided a big punch — at least for the defense.

The Cats beat the Oklahoma State Cowboys 10-0 and remained undefeated in five home games this season. And the victory was, primarily, the result of four interceptions, two fumble recoveries and a blocked field goal attempt.

"That was the finest defense effort we had," Coach Bill Snyder said. "Because, one, we played so well defensively and, two, that is an Oklahoma State team that put some numbers up in the last couple of weeks."

The last five weeks the Cowboys had averaged 292 yards a game, including 403 against Missouri and 378 against Kansas. Against K-State, the Cowboys had just 219.

Jaime Mendez's interception late in the fourth quarter was the 13th interception in his career, a K-State record. And C.J. Masters intercepted a pass for the seventh time this season, also a new mark for the Cats.

Additional interceptions by Kitt Rawlings and Brooks Barta gave the Cats 21 for the season, another school record.

The strong defensive performance was essential. Offensively, the Cowboys had a better game than the Cats. But they failed to score, thanks to K-State's defense.

Two minutes into the second half, Oklahoma State had its best chance to score. After a 29-yard drive, the Cowboys lined up for a 34-yard field-goal attempt. But cornerback Thomas Randolph blocked the kick, keeping the shutout intact.

"The blocked field goal was very instrumental," Snyder said. "But this was typical of how our defense played today."

"We forced fumbles, we got pressure on the quarterback, we tackled better than last week, and we played with greater emotions."

Wide receiver Gerald Benton, who caught a team-high four passes for 35 yards, said the defense once again carried the Cats to the victory.

"Our defense played great. We give all the credit to our defense today," he said.

But Masters said the offense also had their share on the win.

"The offense had to put points on the board first to win," he said. "We just did our part and tried to keep Oklahoma State from scoring."

K-State's first scoring drive was sparked by Rawlings' interception just three minutes into the game. The offense then took the ball 43 yards down the field where Tate Wright kicked a 30-yard field goal to give K-State a 3-0 lead.

Five minutes later, Brent Venables recovered a fumble on Oklahoma's 33-yard line. After gaining two first-downs, K-State scored on a second and goal on the first play of the second quarter.

The Cats successfully ran a fumblerooski by offensive lineman Toby Lawrence for an eight-yard touchdown run.

"The last time we used it was against Oklahoma two years ago," Snyder said about the surprising play call. "But today we knew all along we were going to run it."

But that was the last surprise of the Cats' offense. The defense controlled the rest of the game.

"The offense was not very effective," Snyder said. "They did some things they had to do. We didn't give up any great field position."

The victory gave the Wildcats a 15-2 home record since the start of the 1990 season.

Seniors propel defense to win

"If you could write up a storybook on how you'd like it to end, it couldn't have ended any better."

Linebacker Brent Venables, like 19 other Wildcat seniors, played his final game in Manhattan Saturday afternoon against the Oklahoma State Cowboys.

And some of those seniors, including Venables, linebacker

Brooks Barta and strong safety C.J. Masters, anchored the Wildcat defense in what might have been the team's best defensive effort of the season.

Venables recovered a fumble in the first quarter that led to the Cats' only touchdown. He also led the team in tackles with 13, one of which might have been the biggest tackle of the game.

With the Cats clinging to a 10-0 lead in the third quarter,

Oklahoma State drove to the K-State 28-yard line. On fourth down and a yard to go, the Cowboys tried for a first down. But Venables broke through the line and tackled Cowboy fullback John White for no gain.

"I was glad to be in the right place to make the play," Venables said. "It was a great feeling."

Barta, who is leading the Wildcats in tackles for the fourth straight year, intercepted a pass for just the second time in his career. And he followed that pick with a 17-yard return.

On the return, Barta lowered his shoulder and bowled over Cowboy Roddy Wortham. Did Barta see the aftermath of his thunderous hit?

"No. My eyes were crossed."

Wildcat offensive lineman Toby Lawrence got the first offensive carry of his college football career Saturday against Oklahoma State.

"Probably my last one, too," the senior guard said.

But it was a big one for the Wildcats, who scored their only touchdown on a trick play called the fumblerooski and went on to beat the Cowboys 10-0 at KSU Stadium.

K-State was up 3-0 at the start of the second quarter and had a second and goal at the Oklahoma State 8-yard line when head coach Bill Snyder decided to use the trick play.

"It's been in our offensive scheme for awhile," Snyder said about the fumblerooski. "We've had it all along, but this is just the first time we've used it (this season).

"At the time, the offense really needed the boost."

Center Quentin Neujahr snapped the ball between his legs, where quarterback Jason Smargiasso touched the ball and faked a rollout to the right.

Neujahr set the ball on the ground and was supposed to protect it between his legs until Lawrence scooped it up to run with it. But the play didn't go quite as planned.

The ball squirted free and rolled a yard behind Neujahr. Snyder saw the ball come out and had one immediate thought.

"That I was going to shoot Quentin," he said.

"We didn't execute it well, and I thought it was going to be a miserable failure. We were

Spikers end season with 4-game loss

Kathy Wylie, Wildcat spiker, returns a serve during the third game of the volleyball match against Colorado Saturday in Ahearn Field House. The Cats lost the match.

Team finishes
year with 7-21 mark,
0-12 in Big Eight play

BRIAN ANDERSON
Collegian

The 1992 volleyball season and the career of Kathy Saxton ended Saturday night in Ahearn Field House as 18th-ranked Colorado defeated K-State in four games, 15-5, 15-3, 10-15 and 15-10.

The Cats finished the 1992 campaign 7-22 and 0-12 in the Big Eight, the second-worst season for the program.

The Buffaloes improved to 19-8, 8-2 in the conference, as they go into the Big Eight Tournament as the No. 2 seed, behind Nebraska.

The highlight of the night was in game three as K-State held off Colorado to win the game.

The win was the first against the Buffaloes since Nov. 4, 1988.

"We talked and concentrated in the game," Coach Patti Hagemeyer said. "We believed we could play with them."

Both teams tied three different times with the last tie at seven apiece.

The Cats used blocks by Jill Dugan, Angie McKee and Saxton to lead 10-7 before Colorado got back to 10-9 on two K-State errors.

K-State fired back to go on a 5-1 run to win the game.

The Buffaloes helped the Cats win by committing two errors while Heather Zoerner had a block and Saxton had a block and one of her 12 kills.

"I knew things were going right," said Saxton, who finished the season with 505 kills, second-most in Big Eight history, and 1,232 attacks, fourth-most in a season in the conference.

Momentum carried K-State to a 4-2 lead before Colorado came back in game four.

Seven straight points gave the Buffaloes a five-point lead, 9-4. The Cats got within 2 points at 10-12 with the help of a kill by McKee.

"She projects herself as a positive player," Hagemeyer said of McKee. "She has stepped up this past week and has worked hard."

Colorado halted the K-State threat as they scored the next three points to win the game and match.

Despite a brief Cat lead of 5-2 in game one, the Buffaloes used 10 kills to shut out K-State and win the first game, 15-5.

The Cats jumped out to a 3-1 lead before Colorado went on a 14-point run, with the help of 15 kills, to take game two.

"I'm sad it's over," Hagemeyer said of the season.

"I'm sad that Saxton's career is over and that I can't teach six freshmen more volleyball in the gym."

"We have to prove to our program and ourselves that good things can happen," Hagemeyer said.

"Next year, we'll try for more wins."

CHIEFS

KC stuffs Stouffer, wins 24-14

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SEATTLE — Rookie Dale Carter ran back a punt 86 yards for a touchdown and Neil Smith returned a pass interception 22 yards for another as the Kansas City Chiefs marked Dave Krieg's return to the Kingdome by beating the Seattle Seahawks 24-14 Sunday night.

By winning their third game in a row, the Chiefs (7-4) moved into a tie with Denver, a 24-0 loser to the Los Angeles Raiders, for first place in the AFC West. Kansas City ended a three-game road losing streak.

The Seahawks (1-10) lost their eighth straight. Krieg, the Seahawks' starting quarterback for 8 1/2 seasons, signed as a free agent with Kansas City after the 1991 season. Krieg completed 11 of 15 passes for 103 yards.

Kansas City didn't commit a turnover while the Chiefs forced six Seahawk turnovers, including four interceptions and a fumble recovery off Kelly Stouffer, who replaced Krieg as Seattle's quarterback this year.

Smith, a 6-foot-4, 275-pounder, gave Kansas City a 24-7 lead when he picked off Stouffer's pass and returned it 22 yards for his second career touchdown in the third quarter.

The Chiefs led only 10-7 when Carter broke the game open with an 86-yard punt return with 3:37 left in the half. Carter was untouched as he streaked down the left sideline for his second punt-return touchdown this season. Carter had a 46-yard return for a TD against San Diego.

The longest return by a Chief was J.T. Smith's 88-yarder against Oakland in 1979.

CROSS COUNTRY

Wildcat harriers head to nationals

FRANK KLEEMANN
Collegian

K-State's cross country runners finish their season today at Bloomington, Ind., when the harriers compete in the NCAA championship meet at the Indiana University Cross Country Course.

Both teams, the men's and the women's, are looking forward to closing the year successfully.

Student assistant coach Todd Trask said if the teams run as in the previous District V and conference meet, both will have a chance to crack the top 15.

The men's team, currently ranked 13th in the nation, won the District meet at Ames, Iowa, last Saturday while the women, 21st in the ranks, got second but tied for the title at the Big Eight race the previous weekend.

"Tactically, last week's race was nearly perfect," Trask said of the men's performance. "I hope they peak at the right time. If the team even runs faster than at the District, they should be in the top 10."

Individually, the Cats have with junior Francis O'Neill one of the 20-30 up-front runners in the team.

Head coach John Capriotti, who will coach K-State for the last time, said after the District meet O'Neill has a good chance to finish among the top 25 runners to become an all-American. Trask, who was K-State's all-American last year, agreed with Capriotti.

"I believe Francis has a real good shot to be in the top 25 or top 15," he said. "As long as he doesn't get out too fast, he should be there."

The women are looking forward to improving their 22nd place from last year. Capriotti said having no strong up-front runner on the women's squad worries him a little bit, but the runners themselves said it's an advantage.

"If we run as a group, we have an advantage over the teams who have an up-front runner and the rest of the team in the back," sophomore Jeanene Rukan said.

"I think it's an advantage because we push each other and help each other in the end," junior Paulette Staats said.

Trask said if the women's team stays close together as they did during the conference meet, they will finish higher than in the previous year.

"As long as they stay relaxed and control their race, they should be around the 15th place," he said.

The goal is set for the team. In its fourth consecutive appearance, the Cats don't want to finish last again.

"Last year, a lot of us had bad races," Staats said. "I think we can get nothing than better."

Stires' last-second loss to Czechoslovakia

BRIAN ANDERSON
Collegian

Junior college transfer Shanelle Stires had a chance to be the hero of the day for the K-State Lady Cats basketball team Sunday at Bramlage Coliseum.

She made six of 13 field goals for 13 points to lead the team, pulled down four rebounds and came up with a team-high seven steals.

It was the last steal that could have led to a game-winning shot.

K-State was behind 54-53 the Cassovia-Kosice-Czechoslovakia team with 4 1/2 seconds left on the scoreboard when Stires came up with the ball at half court.

Stires drove to the right of the free-throw line. As she went up for the shot, she lost the ball.

"I thought I had a chance to win it, but I lost it," Stires said. "I regained the ball and pushed the ball up and gave it a chance."

The ball hit the back of the rim and bounced away just as the buzzer sounded to end the game.

"It would have been a fairy tale if we had won," Coach Susan Yow said.

"I was pleased with their effort. If we play like this in the Big Eight conference, we'll win games night in and night out."

The win for the Czechoslovakian team was the second on its American tour in five games.

They had lost to Nebraska, Kansas and Southwest Missouri State, and beat Missouri-Kansas City.

"They lost to Southwest Missouri State by nine points and Southwest went to the Final Four," Yow said, comparing K-State's one-point loss.

"We played a team that was well-tuned. They have gotten better as they have played more."

The teams tied eight times in the first half before the Czechs team led at halftime 31-30.

At 35 apiece, the Czechs went on a 12-5 run to lead 47-40 with 8:20 minutes left in the game.

It would have been an even more special victory for Stires. Her mother, Julie, died from a blood clot in September.

CATS TO FACE CUBAN NATIONALS

The men's basketball team will play its second and final exhibition game at 7:30 p.m. against the Cuban national team at Bramlage Coliseum.

The Cubans come to Manhattan with an 0-6 record. They're on an 11-game U.S. tour and have given up an average of 95 points a game.

Last Wednesday, the Wildcats won their first exhibition game of the season, 92-77, against Fort Hood AAU.

Tonight's contest is the last preseason game for the Cats.

SNYDER NAMED ALL-AMERICAN

Wildcat punter Sean Snyder was named to the Kodak all-America team on Friday.

Snyder entered Saturday's game against the Cowboys with a 46.5 yards per punt, a pace that would break the NCAA single-season record of 45.8.

Against Oklahoma State, he punted 12 times and averaged just 34.6 yards a boot.

His current average per punt is 44.56, which is still ahead of the K-State record of 44.3.

Snyder joins Gary Spani as the only Cats to be on the team.

Barta rushed for more than 3,000 yards. With the game clock winding down, Barta ran onto the field and would have rushed had the game lasted one more play.

"It seems like he (Coach Bill Snyder) always finds a way to wiggle out of it," Barta said. "But I'll stay after him."

Masters' final home game was a record-breaking one. He intercepted a pass in the second quarter, his seventh of the season. That broke the Wildcat single-season record.

"I feel pretty good about that," he said. "At least I'm part of making a mark at K-State."

A victory in their last home game, Barta said, was a good way for the seniors to end the season.

"There's mixed emotions," he said. "This might have been the greatest five years of my life, and it's sad to see things go."

"But at the same time, we all realize that we have to move on with our lives."

And Masters said that the end of this era is a sad one.

"These are my brothers away from home," he said. "These are good guys. I'm going to miss them, and I hope they miss me."

"I'm going to miss playing football at K-State."

fortunate we got to it."

Neujahr said he didn't know until later that anything had gone wrong.

"The ball's oval-shaped, and I guess it just bounced funny when it hit the ground," he said.

Oklahoma State coach Pat Jones also saw the football squirt free, but said his players were too busy overpursuing Smargiasso's fake run.

"It looked like one of our guys saw it and just didn't believe it," he said. "It was a heck of a play, just well-executed."

"It was a great time for them to do it, because they still had a couple of downs to score."

Lawrence slid over from the left, snatched the ball off the ground and swept back left to run untouched for the touchdown.

"I probably waddled more into the end zone," the 295-pound lineman said. "I was just trying to be as cool as possible and was hoping we wouldn't get a penalty or anything."

In his last home game, Lawrence said that the play was one of his most exciting moments as a Wildcat.

"But playing with all these guys has been a big thrill."

Fashion show ends awareness month

KRISTI STEPHENSON

An oriental fashion show, sponsored by Asian American Students for Intercultural Awareness, brought Asian American Awareness month to a close Friday night in the Union Station.

"I thought it would be a good way to end the month, with fashion and dance," said Deda Kim, sophomore in occupational therapy, vice president of ASIA and fashion show coordinator.

She said last year she created an international fashion show in Putnam, and thought it would be fun. ASIA has been preparing since September.

The show received its outfits from participants and the International Student Center, Kim said.

"The show is to entertain and show different fashions," she said.

Kim said her intention was to have every country represented. Fashions were shown from Korea, Vietnam, Japan, Philippines, China and Thailand.

"This was to make people realize we're all from different parts of Asia. We're not all the same," she said.

Jonathan Nguyen, senior in business and president of the Vietnamese Student Association, said he felt this promotes Asian culture among not only the University, but also the community because the Manhattan Asian community is growing.

"It's a good way for younger generations who have forgotten a lot of culture to get back to it," he said.

Volunteers and members of the multicultural organization were part of the fashion show, modeling traditional oriental clothing.

"People who aren't Asian can get the idea of the traditional outfit. We don't wear them all the time, just on special occasions," said Sherri O'Dell, junior in English.

Both Kim and Nguyen said they felt the Asian American Awareness Month was successful. Nguyen said the different awareness weeks were packed together, but overall it was successful.

The fashion show was followed by a dance with different ethnic music, as well as American.

Apply for college by computer network

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Jerry Paxton watched for four months as his son labored over one handwritten college application after another.

Then Jerry hit on an idea: a computer network that allows students to fill out a single application and funnel it electronically to several colleges at once.

So he created College Link, a year-old service based in Concord, Mass., that is plugging about 1,000 college applicants into the admissions offices of 400 schools.

"I asked myself, 'Isn't there possibly a better way?'" said Paxton, a former executive for a computer manufacturing company.

To access College Link, students send for a $30 software package and load it onto personal computers or those at school.

After writing essays and figuring out what information to send, they enter the data into the computer as outlined by a list of instructions.

Students can use the process for applications to up to 12 of the 400 colleges. About a dozen of those colleges waive application fees for College Link users.

The students store the information on a computer diskette and mail the diskette to a processing center, which forwards the information it contains to the students' chosen colleges.

"It clearly should be available to everyone," Paxton said. "We found nearly half the kids actually did it in their high schools. It's encouraged by many schools."

Julia Mark, 16, of Reading, Mass., applied to five colleges through Paxton's service. It took 1 1/2 hours. Another college to which she applied, Brown University, is not on Paxton's service; that application took two weeks, Mark said.

Marvin Kaiser, associate dean of Arts and Sciences and director of the Kansas Center for Rural Initiatives, spends about five weeks of every summer working for the United Nations office in Vienna, Austria.

His office's name is too long for even Kaiser to remember.

"Oh God, this is embarrassing," he said. "Let's see, it's the Center for Social Development and Humanitarian Affairs."

Kaiser said that there are about 4,000 employees from hundreds of different countries in Vienna's United Nations office.

"I always get a thrill out of going to the cafeteria for lunch," he said.

"Everyone is speaking in all these different languages. Everyone is reading newspapers from their home country. Some of them don't even look like newspapers."

"It's exciting. It always opens you to looking at the world in new ways."

Kaiser's most recent project was the International Plan of Action on Aging. He worked with United Nations staff from the Ukraine, India, Ireland, Canada, France, Austria and Nepal to help 156 member-countries address their own aging populations' needs.

At every working meeting, several interpreters were present.

"They don't miss a beat. Unbelievable," he said. "Some of the language is quite technical, too. They're so good."

Kaiser began working with the United Nations five years ago after receiving a Kellogg National Fellowship while teaching in K-State's social work department. He described the fellowship as a leadership program that bought three months of his time each year for three years so he could pursue his particular interests and expand his leadership capabilities.

"It sounds funny, but they invest this money in you, and what they expect is for you to take the knowledge you gain and be a better person," he said.

"They want us to live our lives according to our potential. That's quite an affirmation. That's what education should be about."

Carol Peak, associate director for the Kansas Center for Rural Initiatives, will also complete a fellowship this spring with the Kellogg International Leadership Program.

"For me, the main benefit has been to learn what's possible," she said.

"You never know what's possible until you learn what's out there — expanding your vision, to put it simply."

Peak will use the things she has learned from observing community leadership in Brazil, Mexico, Costa Rica and South Africa and apply it to training 100 rural Kansas women through quarterly support group meetings.

Peak's program included 60 people from 17 countries, whereas Kaiser shared his fellowship with 41 other United States citizens.

Relief effort fails; crew remains trapped

ASSOCIATED PRESS

VOLCANO, Hawaii — Poor weather hampered rescue efforts Sunday for two movie cameramen trapped after their helicopter crashed inside a fuming, fog-shrouded crater on the flank of Kilauea Volcano.

A team of rescuers on the crumbling rim of 600-foot-high Pu'u O'o crater kept in voice contact with the men overnight.

One man was spotted briefly Sunday morning on a ledge about 30 feet below the rim, said Mardie Lane, spokeswoman for the Hawaii Volcanoes National Park.

The other man wasn't seen, but was believed to be about 60 feet below the rim. Both said they were OK, she said.

There is no active lava flow in the 500-foot-wide crater, but a pool of lava glows in a 120-foot-deep pit on one side of the crater floor.

The pilot was rescued from the crater floor about 150 feet below the rim after Saturday's crash and was treated for cuts and eye irritation caused by volcanic fumes.

The crew was filming for Paramount Studios in Los Angeles when the helicopter went down.

Britain wages debate over fire expenses

Castle damaged; taxpayers may have to pick up the tab

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LONDON — As firefighters guarded Windsor Castle from further flames on Sunday, opposition lawmakers questioned why taxpayers might have to pay to repair the queen's weekend residence.

Newspapers also speculated whether the fire was a clarion call to Britons doubting the relevance of their monarchy, or whether it underlined how rundown Britain has become.

Friday's fire, which took more than nine hours to contain, severely damaged several historic rooms in the northwest corner of the castle, including St. George's Hall, the ornate banquet hall for visiting heads of state.

"It's a nightmare, and I keep hoping to wake up," Prince Charles told spectators after attending church near another royal estate, Sandringham, in eastern England. "The whole family was devastated."

Queen Elizabeth II has not presented a bill to Parliament for repairs to the 11th century castle.

The cause of the fire was still unknown.

Dickie Arbiter, a spokesman for Buckingham Palace, said it also was not known what items in the castle's rich art collection may have been lost.

"There will be a lot of cross-cataloging to do before we will know the answers. One person who will know is her majesty. The queen knows everything in the castle, and if it's missing she'll know," Arbiter said.

Soldiers of the Household Cavalry returned rescued valuables to the castle on Sunday.

Sunday services were held at St. George's Chapel, and visitors were allowed back on the castle grounds, although well away from the devastated area.

Eighteen firefighters were on duty overnight at the hilltop castle, 20 miles west of London.

William the Conqueror began building Windsor Castle about 1070.

It was greatly expanded and altered in the following centuries, and the queen spends most weekends there.

About 630,000 tourists visited the grounds last year.

The castle contains works by Holbein, Rembrandt, Rubens, Van Dyck, Canaletto and Leonardo da Vinci.

The works include tapestries, books and collections of furniture and porcelain.

Heritage Secretary Peter Brooke said Saturday that the government would pay for the reconstruction, but there were plenty of dissenting voices.

The Sunday Mirror ran an editorial headlined: "The bill's yours, Ma'am."

"When people say the taxpayer will pay for this, is that another cut in expenditure on the homeless and those on social security, or is it additional expenditure?" opposition Labor party lawmaker Tony Benn told The Sunday Times.

Alan Williams, another Labor lawmaker, told BBC radio: "We have an anomalous situation where the taxpayer picks the bills for disasters and for losses, but the royals don't return the financial favor."

Williams acknowledged that Prince Charles pays 25 percent tax on income from his Duchy of Cornwall estate, but he said he hoped the fire would be an impetus for other members of the family to contribute.

The queen, reportedly the richest woman in the world, pays no taxes whatsoever.

But The Mail on Sunday quoted a Conservative lawmaker, former Heritage Secretary David Mellor, as saying the government "will look silly if it simply leaves Windsor Castle to rot while there is an argument about who pays."

The Sunday Telegraph said in a front-page commentary that the fire had stirred public anxiety, warning "all those who are disposed to regard the monarchy as irrelevant or even pernicious to the life of the modern nation."

The fire "may lead people to recognize what they possess in the history of their crown and country, and what they could lose," it said.

But The Independent on Sunday said on its front page that the fire "stems from the new national characteristic of ineptitude. Nothing seems to work as it used to: government, trains, banks, courts, the economy, the monarchy. Now even a royal palace blazes in the night. Fate frowns down."

Bernard Shaw answers questions asked by Ogden Elementary School students Friday after his Landon Lecture. The students' questions ranged from "How many TVs are there at CNN?" to "Do you like children?"

ANCHORING HIS DREAM

By joining CNN, Bernard Shaw took a chance and realized his dream

Shaw autographs a poster for Darla Whipple-Frain, Cooperative Extension Service employee, after his speech Friday morning. Shaw spent much time giving autographs and posing for pictures.

Being a broadcast journalist has always been the dream of Bernard Shaw, principle anchor for CNN.

"Family, friends and anybody I could stop long enough to tell, knew that I wanted to be a broadcast journalist," he said. "I've wanted to do what I am doing ever since I was 13."

Shaw visited K-State Thursday and Friday to give the 93rd Landon Lecture. During his stay, he visited a News and Feature Writing class and spoke about his experiences as a journalist.

"I started at one of the few all-news radio stations, WNUS, in Chicago in 1964. I went from there to a television station in Chicago, and then to a local radio station in the Group W Westinghouse chain," he said.

He was promoted and transferred to Washington in 1968 as White House correspondent to cover the last year of President Lyndon Johnson's administration.

After leaving Group W Westinghouse in 1971, he joined CBS-TV in Washington. He also worked for ABC before joining the CNN anchor team.

"I left the sanctuary of ABC News and joined a network that didn't exist, wasn't even on the air," he said. "I joined CNN in April of 1980, and CNN went on the air June 1, 1980."

"I had colleagues at the other networks who said, 'He is crazy.'"

Shaw said CNN has changed TV news and people's viewing habits.

"The concept of being a 24-hour-a-day, all-news television network was one thing, but viewers seeing live coverage of events as they happened, events in this country and events in other countries, just transformed this business," he said.

It may have transformed the business, but its role isn't to influence people, he said, especially during this election year.

"American voters are too sophisticated to be bamboozled by either reporters or politicians, especially politicians," he said. "We have a stated role. The constitution says we have a role in this democracy."

"Our role is to inform, to analyze, to report, and we do that. When we do our job well, people don't like us. Sometimes they despise us, and they say so. We have an adversarial relationship."

The messenger is always the one who is blamed, he said, which often leads to job dissatisfaction for many journalists.

"We all instinctively want to be liked and respected," Shaw said. "We take a lot of heat."

Being denounced by presidential candidates doesn't bother him, but responding to their criticisms does.

"I worry when we start responding to these criticisms by pulling our punches, by not digging, by not asking the tough questions, by looking the other way. That's when I worry," he said.

"I'd be more concerned if viewers, listeners and readers denounced me for not doing my job."

The glamour of journalism has worn off, he said. The competition has become more cutthroat and deadlier. He said he has seen colleagues die on the job. A reporter has to use common sense in dangerous situations, he said.

"You have to be crazy like a fox," he said. "You have to avoid doing crazy things to endanger you and your colleagues."

Shaw has been in dangerous situations several times, most recently during Operation Desert Storm. Baghdad was the closest he came to losing his life, he said.

"My biggest fear was that, at any point, we would be summarily wiped out."

Despite his fears, he said he wanted to do the best possible job of reporting the story.

"I knew we had the best story in the world, and I wanted very much to report it the best way I could," he said.

He said the experience was extremely exhausting, electrifying and numbing.

"It was frightening, very scary and very dangerous," he said. "And, of course, when you are exhausted, your skills become dull, and over time you make mistakes and stumble, which is why in this business I'm more fearful of exhaustion than I am of making some forgetful mistake."

This has been one of the most fascinating years in political history.

he said. He said he saw three things that made this election different. "There was the presence of Ross Perot and how he molded the campaign dialogue on the federal deficit issues and the national debt issue. The omnipresence of the economy and jobs as an issue was very impressive," Shaw said. "And the Democrats smell of blood after being on the outside after 12 years," he said. "They began to think that they could win the White House, to feel they could win the White House. Those three factors were fascinating in this campaign. "All this in a year that was supposed to be utterly dull. What amuses me most are these Democrats who were afraid to run for president in 1992 because of George Bush and his gulf war victory lap. It spooked them."

seven-inch fingernails and a voice to curl them. In some productions, Fruma-Sarah has sounded more like Ethel Merman rather than an insane Care Bear, but the visual effect was more than enough. The lead song, "Tradition," spells out the folkways that have been the underpinnings of the small Jewish community for longer than anyone can remember. The song's melody surfaces throughout the evening, running both the beat of the show and the tempo of Tevye's life. Jerry Bock wrote the music for "Fiddler," and Sheldon Harnick penned the lyrics.

Time to stop silliness, Shaw says

The confirmation hearings of Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas had an important effect on American women, Shaw said. "The manner in which law professor Anita Hill was questioned and treated had a profoundly catalytic and explosive impact on American politics and American women. "This nation will never be the same," he said. "More than one Senate candidate said she was outraged by the tough and rude handling of Professor Hill and what she was insisting happened." Men have a double standard when it comes to sexual harassment, he said. "Resonating throughout this election was one undeniable truth:

Most American men possess in their psyches a winking double standard for the charge, the complaint of sexual harassment." Women make up nearly half of the American work force, but they are not acknowledged as equals, making an average of 75 cents on every dollar of male co-workers, he said. "And then there's the stench of discrimination in promotions along executive row, described by one of the most odorous euphemisms ever thought up — the glass ceiling." Less than 6 percent of all top executives in the United States are female, he said. "Women are fighting this poison in the workplace on all fronts, enduring the frustration of proving job discrimination, of proving sexual harassment and abuse, of resisting the dumping ground for female managers," he said. Shaw quoted U.S. Labor Secretary Lynn Martin, saying that if an executive is male and white, he will select people just like him to be around him. Although some companies and executives are working to change the way women are treated in the workplace, he said, they are not in the majority. "As this happens each day in our cities and each day in our counties and each day in our states, each day we as a nation of people suffer," he said. Shaw gave an example of his boss, CNN founder and owner Ted Turner. "I don't greet him by saying, 'Hi, Ted, honey, or darling or sweetie.' "If I don't do that with him, or with other males with whom I work, what makes me think I should be able to do that to a person just because she is a woman?" Americans must stop subjecting women to both blatant and subtle abuses that men would never tolerate, he said, and TV news is one field that remains divided between the sexes. Male TV reporters over age 50 with wrinkles and gray hair are considered experienced. Not women. "It is time for television and our nation in general to stop this deluding fixation, this silliness, this preoccupation with youth. "It is time to respect the right of women to wrinkle and to gray on the job," Shaw said.

ESSENTIALS

He says she says 'yes,' but she is really saying 'no'

DEAR CASSANDRA, First of all, I would like to say that I enjoy your column very much and read it every day. Keep up the good work! I have a serious problem with my girlfriend. We have been going out for three years and are in love. We enjoy each other's company and get along very well. The problem is that every time I want to have sex, she decides not to at the last minute. She usually has some excuse to get out of it. I don't understand, though, because we often talk about it, but when it actually comes time, she doesn't go through with it. I'm pretty sure she wants to do it, but I can't seem to convince her at the right time. What should I do?

Confused and Worried

DEAR CONFUSED, The key here is in what you have just said: "The problem is that every time I want to have sex..." Sex is something that both of you must agree on for it to be a good experience. I do not believe your girlfriend wants sex as much as your hormones are telling you. You mention that you frequently talk about the subject, so take a moment and honestly discuss how she feels about it.

This may be her first time, or she may have previously had a bad experience. It may be physically painful for her, or, more simply, she has made an intelligent, conscious decision that she is not ready for that type of relationship. Whatever it is, she has not been able to bring herself to tell you, out of fear of hurting your feelings, or out of fear of losing the relationship. My advice is, if you value the relationship, to back off the sex issue. Show her that you are mature and patient enough to wait, however long that may be, until she is ready. In the end, she will love you all the more for it, and that is the point at which sex is not just good, it is fantastic!

DEAR CASSANDRA,

In response to Mad Hatter and all of the other frustrated single people out there, I agree with all of you! Mad Hatter, you are right — meeting people of the opposite sex is a chore in this community. One would think a college town would provide the perfect arena for meeting someone, but the truth is, a college/military environment is a montage of people with different values, morals, beliefs, etc., all in one place with no idea of how to connect with people who have the same values, morals and beliefs that you do.

As a single woman, Mad Hatter, I can tell you that many men I know immediately begin to distance themselves the minute they sense that the woman may want romantic involvement. So, oftentimes, I have told men we are just going to be friends, even knowing that I wanted more, just to take some of the pressure off the man. Perhaps this is some of the "uptightness" you have experienced with women. I don't claim to have all of the answers, but I do feel that meeting Mr./Mrs. Right in this day and age is like a form of job hunting; it's not like the days of Mom and Dad in a small town when there were a handful of men/women to choose from in church.

Single and I'm Not Sure Why

DEAR SINGLE,

I really do understand your frustration in meeting people, but sometimes these things require a change of attitude and some "new" tactics. Please read my next letter.

DEAR CASSANDRA,

I have been reading the letters in your column pertaining to the difficulties of meeting singles outside of the local "meat markets" and decided to lend some insight from my own experiences and those of others.

Years ago, when I was a sophomore in college (first time around) I, too, was discouraged with the jerks I met in the bars. One day, I was sitting in a hallway waiting for a class to start, nursing a bruised heart and deciding to give up on men altogether. I overheard two guys nearby talking, and one said: "I'm beginning to think there are no nice girls around." I looked at him and was immediately intrigued, but he didn't notice me. I stood up and dropped my books, which of course generated immediate notice from everyone around me. I looked at this guy and gave him my best smile. OK — a silly tactic, but it worked. Seventeen years and three children later, we are still together and happy.

Now for the advice. My experience and that of others has indicated that when you stop trying so hard to look for that "right" person, that is when they are apt to walk into your life. If you have a tendency to be shy, find a person among your acquaintances who has an outgoing and sociable personality, and cultivate a friendship. This person will introduce you to a wide variety of people, even if you have to be dragged to parties and places you'd never attempt on your own initiative. One final point: Look beyond the exterior of a person. The best treasures are hidden, and they take time and effort to discover.

A Non-trad

DEAR NON-TRAD,

Great advice and a wonderful story! We pass up many opportunities every day to casually meet people and make friends. You obviously do not have to be at a bar or other "social establishment" to meet Mr./Mrs. Right. It usually turns out that "dream guy/girl" is the person next door.

CONFIDENTIAL TO CONCERNED FRIEND,

Thank you for the tip. You have my word they will not run.

Merger positive, dean says

"One thing it will do is make the combined programs a little more attractive. We need to find more students to fill up the programs," Cole said.

"We've got a fair amount of faculty and space not being utilized. We're hoping to increase efficiency, so as to increase numbers."

Some other changes proposed for the K-State-Salina campus are the addition of a bachelor's degree in professional flight and an associate degree in business data processing, Henry said.

One result of the streamlining is including an environmental emphasis.

"An environmental aspect will be added to the programs," Cole said.

In terms of other universities that have done this, it has done nothing more than increase the number of students. The problem of attracting more students is very high."

There are 12 other points of emphasis on K-State-Salina's list of aspirations.

One way the K-State-Salina campus would finance these changes is through the reduced number of salaries, Cole said.

"We save a fair amount of money from administrative salaries no longer paid because of the merger."

"The dollars realized from the merger are earmarked for equipment," he said.

"One other source of money is from the possible sale of property on the south side of campus. The principle source, though, is the administrative salaries."

Henry also said using administrative salaries on campus improves efficiency.

None of the proposed changes threaten jobs, Cole said.

"There won't be any hirings or firings," he said.

"We're cleaning up the number of majors and departments, packaging them in a much more palatable way, so the students will be attracted to them."

K-State-Salina's priority list was determined by the college core group, made up of two students, seven faculty members, two administrative representatives and two classified employees, Cole said.

K-State-Salina has 501 full-time students and 750 total.

According to Henry's figures, fewer than 10 students will be affected by the proposed mergers.

Board approves higher standards

implementation of changes will be a two- to four-year process.

The board also approved higher standards for admission to teacher education programs at regent schools.

K-State students will now be required to have a 2.75 GPA on a 4.0 scale in 35 credit hours for admittance to professional classes.

Students also will have to pass an admittance test, which will be chosen by the regents in March 1993.

Current requirements for admittance are a 2.5 GPA and a score of 50 percent on the Pre-professional Skills Test, the national standardized test for potential teachers.

Fort Hays State President Edward Hammond, along with two of the regents, expressed concern that the standard was too high.

However, K-State Education Dean Michael Holen said these arguments have little validity.

"I think, first of all, we're having too many students coming into teacher education in regards to the number of available jobs," he said.

Increased standards will still be able to satisfy the number of needed teachers and provide the school with the most qualified students, he said.

Holen served on the regent subcommittee that made the recommendations to the board.

The regents have not set a final implementation date for the higher standards, but Holen said they will most likely take effect in fall 1994.

The increases will not affect any students currently enrolled.

K-State also received final approval to construct an indoor practice facility just south of Bramlage Coliseum.

The structure will be 230 feet by 400 feet and 70 feet tall and will contain a full-sized artificial grass football field.

The project will cost $2.98 million and will be paid for by private donations.

Utility costs will be paid on a share basis, with one-third paid by the athletic department and the other two-thirds paid by the state.

The board also heard first reading on increases in housing and academic fees.

K-State proposed a 9.9 percent increase for 93-94 that will take total housing and food costs to $3,120 a year. That represents a $280 increase from the 92-93 rate of $2,840.

That's the highest proposed increase among regents schools.

According to the proposal, it is necessary to cover increases in operating costs and to offset effects of declining occupancy rates.

K-State has also requested a $5 increase in undergraduate and an $8 increase in graduate student cost per hour for classes offered off campus.

Current off-campus fees are $67 for undergraduates and $87 per graduate student per hour.

The board will take final action on the proposed fee increases at its December meeting.

Disabled benefit from auction

less expensive items to the auction. They also solicited restaurants to donate food, serve alcohol, and tried to dress up the entire promotion, said Teresa Rickel-McMillin, a festival organizer.

"We like the fact that smaller items have been introduced," said Ward. "It helps get more people involved."

There were about 88 contributors for food, advertising and auction items, Adams said.

To get more work done when you're on the go, think about the new IBM® ThinkPads™.

At the top of the line is the ThinkPad 700 series with 486SLC power and a 10.4" active-matrix color display (or a 6.4" gray-scale monochrome display). There's also a unique tracking device, TrackPoint II, that's ideally situated on the keypad to let you command the entire screen with one fingertip. The ThinkPad 300 has the same sleek, slim design and an even slimmer price.

All ThinkPads have easily readable and adjustable screens, full-size keyboards and front-loading disks. Plus, they're all expandable with a wide range of add-on products.

Best of all, ThinkPads come with IBM HelpWare™—a range of service and support that includes an international warranty and a 24-hour 800 help number.

Come in today and walk out with an IBM ThinkPad.

It's a big idea in a fantastic small package.

MALCOLM X

Brother commends youngsters

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The youth of today deserve credit for reviving the interest in Malcolm X that has led to a new movie about the civil-rights leader, Malcolm's brother says.

"Many of the adults have been taught to reject Malcolm's teachings," Abdul-Aziz Omar, the older brother of the slain black leader, said at a Kansas City school Saturday. "If it wasn't for the youth, we wouldn't have Malcolm's speeches."

Omar also told 200 people at the lecture that Malcolm's legacy should not be reduced to a single phrase or a fashion symbol.

Interest in Malcolm X — and sales of clothing and items with his likeness or name — have jumped recently, due in part to the release of a new film about his life.

Omar, in fact, wore a baseball cap emblazoned with an "X" at one point in his appearance.

But he said people should remember Malcolm X for the positive changes he made in his lifetime.

Omar, born Philbert Little in 1923 in Omaha, Neb., joined the Nation of Islam in 1946 while his brother, two years younger, was serving a prison sentence.

Malcolm joined the religious group after he was released from prison. He broke with the group in 1963.

Omar remained with the group until 1975. He now speaks around the country about the importance of education and about his brother.

Veterinary medicine looking to fine tune

Merger would create microbiology, pathology program

DIANE DENISON

EDITOR'S NOTE: The Kansas Board of Regents has called for new Role and Aspirations Statements from each state university. This is the seventh story in a series on what K-State's colleges are doing to fulfill this mandate.

Proposed changes in the College of Veterinary Medicine will fine tune the college, not create a demand for more money, its dean said.

"Some of the things we're doing, we've been doing for several years and are part of the base budget that we have," Dean Michael Lorenz said.

"The strengthening of certain areas is currently going on through a reallocation process within the college budget."

The biggest change is the merger of the pathology and laboratory medicine departments into the Department of Pathology and Microbiology.

The college's goal to keep much of the program the same as it is under the Kansas-Nebraska regional agreement.

It provides a contract for the veterinary medical education of Nebraska residents at K-State.

"The Kansas-Nebraska agreement is good for the college because it brings in a very diversified group of people each year," said Susan Ridenour, third-year student in veterinary medicine.

There are some aspects of the programs the college would like to improve, Lorenz said, but they will require additional funding.

"For instance, strengthening the graduate program," he said. "The graduate program does not have a secure source of state funding."

Most of the graduate program's expenses are to be covered by research-generated funds, but the college has not had a history of good productivity in that area, he said.

"The reason being, this college was so chronically underfunded compared to other veterinary schools that the resources largely had to be placed on the DVM (doctorate of veterinary medicine) program,"

Lorenz said.

The graduate program is necessary to achieve the state's high research expectations, he said.

This can not be funded out of the current budget. Another $500,000 would be needed to do this, he said.

"If, by strengthening the college's research, it can help the college as a whole, then it should be done," said Theresa Heibel, second-year student in veterinary medicine.

"But it would be great if they could filter some of the money generated into teaching."

Lorenz said the college also works with the other colleges to provide University-wide equipment when duplication is not required.

"Within the vet school, they're a very efficient group already, and I think what we're seeing is a fine tuning of their operations that would make it even more efficient and productive," said Dennis Kuhlman, professor of agricultural engineering and chairman of the Provost's Committee for Role and Aspirations.

The college is also working to strengthen its interactions with other colleges involved in animals and population health.

South Africa attack kills 4

ASSOCIATED PRESS

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — Blacks burst into a country club dining room and bar and opened fire with automatic rifles and hand grenades, killing four whites and wounding 17, officials said Sunday.

The Saturday night slaughter in King William's Town, 625 miles southeast of Johannesburg, was a rare mass attack on whites.

No one claimed responsibility for the assault, which appeared to be racially or politically motivated.

Blood splattered the floor and dining tables at the King William's Town Golf Club. A grenade blew a hole in the floor, and shrapnel brought down part of the ceiling. Drinking glasses and windows were shattered.

The assailants escaped, and police announced a massive manhunt and offered a $17,000 reward for information leading to arrests.

The bloody attack was the realization of many whites' worst fears in this racially divided nation, where black-on-black violence has taken thousands of black lives in recent years.

KILLING IN SOUTH AFRICA

SHANE KEYSER/Collegian

Whites — outnumbered 30 million to 5 million — have feared for generations that the black majority could turn on them.

The attack came at a sensitive time politically. The government and the African National Congress, the leading black group, are scheduled to meet this week to try to restart derailed talks on ending white minority rule.

NEWS DIGEST

AMERICAN AIRLINES PLANS LAYOFFS

FORT WORTH, Texas (AP) — As many as 1,000 American Airlines employees could lose their jobs today when the nation's largest airline announces layoffs.

Plans to lay off 1,000 managers were announced in October and could save the company as much as $40 million next year.

"It's permanent, with no recalls expected," airline spokesman Tim Smith said.

The layoffs will hit many departments and represent up to 10 percent of that segment of the airline's work force.

CIA: IRAN COULD HAVE NUKES BY 2000

NEW YORK (AP) — A draft CIA report says Iran's nuclear arms program is progressing, and it could develop a nuclear weapon by the year 2000, the New York Times reported today.

Senior administration officials told the Times the report reflects views expressed by CIA Director Robert Gates in testimony before Congress in March.

But other intelligence experts disagree, and the newspaper said the report was expected to be challenged when it is reviewed by other U.S. intelligence agencies this week.

A report from late last year concluded that only some of Iran's revolutionary leaders were intent on developing nuclear weapons.

Department head named

Grain science reins are taken by Richard Hahn

BILL SPIEGEL
Collegian

An opening in the University administration was filled over the holiday.

Richard Hahn is the new head of the grain science department. The position had been open since Charles Deyoe resigned in March.

Hahn, who has been director of the Kansas Value Added Center for the past three years, began his new job Nov. 23.

He was selected after a nationwide search by the selection committee, College of Agriculture dean Marc Johnson said.

"It is standard procedure to put out a nationwide search. The committee recommended that we interview Hahn and a University-based biochemistry professor," he said.

Johnson said Hahn was chosen for his wide background and familiarity with the grain industry, in addition to his solid research background.

Hahn spent 30 years in the grain industry as vice-president for A.E. Staley, a corn and soybean processor in Decatur, Ill.

"These are not typical academic qualifications, but I have industry contacts and long professional relationships," Hahn said. "My experience is not exactly typical of the University, but I think it fits the department fairly well."

Johnson said Hahn's industry experience is not uncommon in the grain science department.

"Many faculty members came from industry," he said. "They should operate on the same wavelength."

COMMUNITY SERVICE PROGRAM

Students help state's homeless children

ROY GRABER
Collegian

Two K-State students are piloting projects to seek shelter for homeless children.

Wes Ray, senior in social work, said the state contacted the K-State Community Service Program to work on the problem of homelessness in some Kansas communities.

"Basically, the Kansas Board of Education got a subgrant from the federal government to work on homeless issues, particularly school-aged children," Ray said.

"They thought we needed to pick some model communities due to the number of homeless children in these towns."

He said Lawrence, Hutchinson and Salina were selected. A survey indicated these towns had a total of 111, 52 and 46 homeless children, respectively.

Ray will direct the project in Salina, and Mark Hager, graduate student in speech, will lead the Hutchinson project.

Hager said a University of Kansas student has been selected to oversee the Lawrence project.

Needy children to receive toys

Area children in need of Christmas presents won't be disappointed, thanks to Operation Santa Claus.

Operation Santa Claus will be run by Fort Riley's 34th Engineer Battalion. The program, created five years ago, helps supply needy children toys at Christmas time in Fort Riley, Manhattan, Junction City and Ogden.

The battalion's goal for the program is to receive 15,000 toys for area children.

Project volunteer Sgt. Randy Stewart said the program will first focus on children at Fort Riley.

"We will start with the companies," Stewart said. "They will give their requests to the battalions, and then the battalions will give requests to the brigades."

"Once all the requests are gathered, then we will know where we stand," he said.

After distributing gifts to Fort Riley children, they will accept requests from the surrounding areas, Stewart said.

"We have points of contact in Ogden, Manhattan and Junction City," he said.

"They accept requests for the needy families in the cities so we deal with one person and not thousands."

Greg McCrimmon, the project's contact in Ogden, said his community has a need for Operation Santa Claus.

"We looked at the elementary schools and found out the children who were on the reduced lunch program," McCrimmon said.

"We provided them with applications for Operation Santa Claus," he said.

"Some returned them, and some weren't interested in program. But we will end up with about 50 children from Ogden, and that is outstanding."

Many area businesses, churches and programs have already donated gifts.

"We have started receiving toys already," Stewart said. "Once we get the toys, they are wrapped and put into bags. Each bag contains three presents."

The gifts will be divided into age categories and gender by color.

There will be seven age divisions ranging from infants to children 13 years or older.

Simplicity, appeal help winning design

Susan Hibbs, senior in interior design, won a contest with her design for the set of the KSNT-TV Channel 27 news. The set was installed at the beginning of November. Hibbs won a $500 cash award for her design.

A class project resulted in money and recognition for a senior in interior design.

KSNT-TV Channel 27 selected Susan Hibbs' design as its new backdrop, which is now in place, said KSNT news director John Rinkenbaugh.

Winning the backdrop contest earned Hibbs a $500 cash award. She plans to enjoy the money by saving up for a spring break vacation.

"The contest sounded like a good beginning project for the semester," said Cynthia Mohr, professor of interior design.

Rinkenbaugh said he called Mohr with the idea to have interior design students participate in a contest to design a new backdrop for the KSNT studio. Three interior design classes then came up with designs for the backdrop.

Interior design professors selected the top 20 designs to present to KSNT. The staff picked the top four designs based on practicality and narrowed their selections down to two designs.

"We then invited the top two students to give presentations, and the department heads got together to select the best one," Rinkenbaugh said.

That was the moment of truth for Hibbs.

"I had a 50-50 chance of winning," she said. "The other girl's design was really good. I was positive about my chances, but I didn't want to think I had won before I found out."

Hibbs' backdrop was based on an idea she got from watching television newscasts.

Rinkenbaugh said the station picked Hibbs' design for its simplicity.

"It had the look we wanted and would make implementing the design change easier," he said. "The look of the design had an appeal."

Group promotes giving

Winter Wonderland begins today and runs through Dec. 4 in the K-State Union.

The week's activities, sponsored annually by Mortar Board, promote holiday spirit at K-State and in the Manhattan community, Mortar Board president Carolyn Farris said.

"The main focus is to serve the K-State community and the kids around Manhattan," said Marc Scarbrough, Mortar Board programs co-chairman.

The week's highlight will be a gift exchange. Gifts donated by campus groups will be given to children in the Manhattan area Big Brothers/Big Sisters program.

Mortar Board has asked groups to donate toys, which will be wrapped and given to the children at a party Friday.

"One of the objectives of Mortar Board is to be of service to the campus and the community," Farris said. "We think this is a fun way to help others during the holiday season."

The week will also feature singing by groups from K-State in the Union, storytelling for children and pictures with Santa, Farris said.

The Ultralites Dance/Step team will speak out with other multicultural organizations from 11:30 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. Wednesday in the K-State Union Courtyard.

"Through the speak-out, we hope to make people aware that multicultural organizations are having trouble getting into mainstream organizations," said Angela Smith, team captain and junior in pre-law.

"We have needs to be met just like any other organization."

Last fall, the Ultralites became an official campus group. The team's 12 members perform dances that include African-American steps.

Gramm: Help not improper

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Sen. Phil Gramm said Sunday he provided only routine help to a savings and loan operator who was paid $63,000 for doing $117,000 worth of work on the senator's vacation home.

The FBI looked into the transaction but dropped the probe after the Senate Ethics Committee conducted a cursory review of the matter, the New York Times reported Sunday.

There was no written estimate or contract for the work, the Times reported.

The S&L owner, Texas businessman Jerry Stiles, asked Gramm's office for assistance in dealing with regulators in 1989 when Stiles' three savings and loan companies faced collapse. Their bailout is expected to cost taxpayers $200 million.

Gramm, R-Texas, is a Senate Banking Committee member who helped develop a government bailout program for struggling S&Ls. The panel oversees regulators handling the S&L cleanup.

Stiles is a prominent Dallas homebuilder who bought the Hallmark Savings and Loan Association of Plano, Texas, in 1984.

In a statement, Gramm acknowledged he and Stiles arranged in 1987 for a work crew to fly to Maryland and complete the interior of Gramm's shell vacation home on the state's Eastern Shore.

Gramm told the Times he contacted Stiles because the senator wanted to provide work for Texas laborers and help boost the state's sluggish economy. He said Maryland's Eastern Shore contractors and laborers had reputations for being unreliable.

Three months after the work was completed, Gramm paid Stiles $63,433, although the bill came to $117,019. The Times said three or four workers were flown to Maryland and stayed in a hotel for about two months while they worked on the vacation home.

Gramm maintained Sunday he paid what he owed under an oral contract with Stiles and didn't learn of the additional costs until two years after work was completed.

Abortion film showing biased

THE ISSUE

Clearwater High School will show an anti-abortion film depicting an actual second trimester abortion.

WE SUGGEST

The administration needs to equally teach both sides of the issue, which it is failing to do.

Discussing the topic of abortion in a high-school health class is commendable.

Making the discussion lopsided is condemnable.

Freshmen at Clearwater High School today are viewing "Eclipse of Reason," a decidedly anti-abortion film of a woman having a second-trimester abortion. According to Saturday's Wichita Eagle, Principal Keith Pauly says he doesn't understand why some parents and pro-choice advocates are up in arms over the event.

They should be. While the school is making an effort to address a difficult issue, it is only presenting one side completely. Graphically so.

Films and speakers covering the pro-choice side of the debate are readily available, yet the school did not deem it necessary to review them as they did the pro-life material. Pauly's excuse? He claims not to have known the pro-choice view was similarly available. Anyway, he says, the local school board must approve such curriculum, as it did "Eclipse of Reason."

But this is no excuse at all.

Either school officials should have presented the board equal material when this decision was made, or board members should have requested it when they were asked to approve only a piece of celluloid propaganda to teach students about abortion.

Now, Pauly says a pro-choice session may be offered next semester to balance things out. But this is clearly a reactionary afterthought and evidence of poor, slanted planning on the school's part. A public school is no place for figures of authority to inflict their views on students in the guise of "education."

School officials say the students have many choices in the issue. They are free to refuse to watch. They are free to walk out. After the film, which is supposed to be followed by a neutral discussion of the whole issue by the teacher, they are free to decide for themselves what to think.

But forcing them to decide what to think on such a lopsided presentation of the complex, emotional topic of abortion is no choice at all.

FOOTBALL

Team deserves better than obscene crowd

Editor,

I am absolutely appalled by the conduct of the crowd at the K-State football games. During the one game I went to this year, I had to move three different times because of the rude students. They would moose in front of me, stand on the bleachers and spew their lewd and obscene comments as loudly as they possibly could. I vowed then I would not return.

I read in the Collegian about the Iowa State game televised on ESPN. I was horrified at what I read. Supposedly alcohol is not allowed in the parking lot or in the stadium, but this rule is obviously not being enforced. I could not believe the way K-State fans treated the ISU cheerleaders. And as for the famous Willie the Wildcat, he is representative of K-State. The actions he took affected not only the reputation of the University, but also the attitudes of the young kids that worship him and the reputation of the football team.

This brings me to another sore spot. The football team has worked extremely hard to improve their reputation as well as their record. I think that they deserve a better support group than this. The students are not the only group to blame for this conduct. There are also many season ticket holders who are "reliving their childhood" by conducting themselves as unruly children with no respect for property or other individuals.

I think that for the sports programs at K-State to be successful, the fans must conduct themselves in a more positive manner to give K-State a more positive image.

They could keep the policy of no appointments during this time and only take walk-ins. The physicians could rotate their lunch breaks. Four physicians could go to lunch while four stayed on duty. This way the students who pay their $80 a semester would not be turned away. Something must be done. At least stop putting the judgment of health care in the hands of one nurse.

MARRIAGE ROLES

Columnist's recovery should be applauded

Editor,

I want to compliment John Hart on his efforts to clarify his position regarding a women's role in marriage. The column was well-written and carefully reasoned based on information and arguments with which Hart was obviously familiar.

Hart may not have soothed over any wounds with certain feminists on campus, but he certainly expressed himself better than he had previously.

He is right to suggest many feminists want to deny the differences between the sexes, but he is not practical about what the ideal husband would give to a marriage. The ideal is rarely attainable, submission is often perceived as weakness, and weakness is almost always exploited.

Despite any disagreement with Hart's position, I do applaud his desire to improve and clarify his writing and beliefs.

LAFENE

Staffing, lunch break schedule questionable

Editor,

Lafene Health Center was developed for K-State students to have convenient, inexpensive health care. Although Lafene provides many good services to students, there is still an enigma.

It has been brought to my attention that Lafene closes its doors from 11:30 a.m. to 1 p.m. Monday through Friday. When I spoke with Larry Moeller, Lafene's chief of staff, he assured me that Lafene will see students with medical problems during this time.

The problem is that students are being turned away. One nurse decides whether a student has an emergency problem. If she feels the problem is not an emergency, the student will not be seen at all. I do not want to doubt this nurse's qualifications, but why do we leave one nurse to make the choice to help or impede medical assistance? There are eight physicians on staff who take their lunch break at the same time. This means that if students come into Lafene with a medical emergency, they will have to wait for the doctor on call to get to Lafene.

Lafene should keep its doors open throughout lunch break.

Opinion Page Editor's Note:

On Page 10 of today's Collegian, a paid advertisement appears concerning the submission of a letter to the editor that did not run. As I have already personally spoken to this individual as to why his letter did not appear, I feel it necessary to defend my position on this issue.

The Athletic Fee debate has been of particular interest to many on campus. To reflect this, I have tried to run letters reflecting both sides of the issue. When choosing these letters, those submitted by the students and faculty were given top priority, while those from persons off-campus were given lesser priority. Not being a student or faculty member, this is one reason why Mr. Beck's letter was not chosen to run.

The other reason is that I felt this letter was an unmitigated, slanderous and personal attack on Senators Joel Gruenke and Sharon Grieb. I will not allow the Opinion Page to be the vehicle of personal vendettas. Yes, I have run letters that have attacked columnists. But the columnists are well aware in advance that this will be done and in fact, encourage it.

I am sorry Mr. Beck was so insulted as to run the ad. It is his prerogative to do so. But Collegian policy simply doesn't allow for vindictive letters such as this one to appear, and we will continue this policy.

TOLES

PC falls far short of what it advocates

The PC movement is not concerned with encouraging free and open debate.

Politically correct idealism is a narrow, hypocritical viewpoint

Native American, Mother-Father God, spokesperson, winter break. These terms are only four of many which have received the title of being "politically correct."

The term "politically correct," PC for short, is frequently thrown around in various University forums, including this page, yet no one is sure of its meaning. To my knowledge, the PC movement does not have card-carrying members or a chairman of the board. Yet the movement has broad, although often unspoken support, especially on college campuses.

A PC person is a liberal committed to establishing a more tolerant and diverse society. This involves advocating any issue that will result in an increase in civil liberties such as gay rights or multiculturalism. Also, a PC person is usually an environmentalist. As implied by the name, a PC person is convinced she or he is right.

Universities have long been critical of the Western Judeo-Christian tradition. This continual rejection of "traditional" conservative ideas creates an ideological vacuum that is quickly filled by "progressive" liberal ideas. The PC movement, which embodies the agenda of modern liberalism, is the most recent set of ideas to fill this vacuum.

In that process, the PC movement has invoked religious devotion to their First Amendment God. The movement has not only taken on the appearance of a religion, but a legalistic religion that condemns non-believers for not obeying its rigid codes. The PC movement is not concerned with encouraging free and open debate but converting the ignorant masses to their "correct" and enlightened view of reality through coercive education.

Conservative commentator Thomas Sowell offers a poignant criticism of this thinking. "Has there ever been a more arrogant term than 'raising the consciousness' of someone else? It says that people who disagree with you are not to be debated on the same plane."

JOHN HART

For those who recall columnist Scott Spradlin violating the PC code of tolerance and diversity by stating that he believed homosexuality was immoral, he wasn't labeled as a person who thought homosexuality was immoral. But he was stereotyped by PC sympathizers as a homophobic, a person who fears homosexuals. Are all people who disagreed with Bush, Bushophobics?

While attempting to embrace every alternative view and lifestyle, the PC movement only succeeds in promoting conformity to a rigid ideology. Those who fail to conform are attacked and stereotyped as racists, sexists, bigots and homophobics by the PC police, an authoritarian structure schooled in the art of witch hunts.

I find it curious how liberals can support the PC agenda while holding a belief in relativism, the idea that truth and morality are relative to the individual and you can't say another's values are wrong based on your own standard.

The labeling of an action as politically correct requires a standard with which to label that action as correct or incorrect. Since the PC movement rejects the idea of an objective standard of truth and morality beyond the individual, they have no basis to describe anything as "correct" or "right."

Despite the idiocy and hypocrisy of the PC movement, I encourage conservatives to not take an adversarial stance on any issue that could be construed as politically correct. Instead, I hope we will examine each issue specifically and then speak out against any injustices with boldness and conviction. It is possible to be a good steward of the environment without being a fanatic.

It is possible to be a tolerant and loving person without advocating all individual differences and lifestyle choices.

Capriotti leaves trail of success

He was, quite frankly, not the best friend of everyone who had to deal with him. But the reason why nobody really lost contact with him can be summed up in one word: success.

John Capriotti, K-State coach of cross country and track and field for the past six years, resigned the night after the conference meet Oct. 31 in Boulder, Colo.

It was the night after the meet he called one of his career highlights, when the women's team tied for the title, and the men's team got second.

Capriotti follows his mentor, former coach and athletic director Steve Miller, to accept a job at Nike Inc.

For some it is a relief; for others, a pity.

Capriotti never really could hold back what he thought about things that concerned him.

Sitting with him and talking about a general budget cut throughout the athletic department was an experience in itself. Capriotti talked honestly about unfair treatment of his program, the most successful one at K-State since he became head coach in 1987.

"Why should we spend $80,000 to finish eighth in the conference when you can spend $40,000 to do it?" he asked, referring to another K-State program. "I represent 75 athletes, and when they're treated unfairly, I'm going to speak up."

He always risked unpopularity and negative response with his remarks, but, quite frankly, he didn't give a damn. All what he wanted was "the best for my kids."

"I'm going to miss this school and the kids. It was my whole life," he said after his resignation.

He fought for every penny he could get for his athletes. Unfortunately, he apparently went a little too far with his concern.

Capriotti is leaving while his track and field program, according to the Nov. 4 Manhattan Mercury, is being internally investigated for giving money to athletes who were once enrolled.

However, that can't overshadow Capriotti's success on the track.

This year, Capriotti is the Big Eight women's coach of the year after his runners tied Nebraska for the conference title.

Placing second at the NCAA District meet, the women's team qualified for nationals for the fourth consecutive time and the fifth time in Capriotti's six-year reign.

During his time as coach, K-State produced 48 all-Americans, 59 conference champions and two national champions.

The numbers speak for themselves. Capriotti was successful.

It will be hard to replace him.

Askia Jones, Brian Henson and Aaron Collier scored in double-figures Tuesday to help K-State go undefeated in exhibition play, beating the Cuban Nationals 84-72 in Bramlage Coliseum.

Coach Dana Altman wasn't happy with his team after the game, despite the win.

"I'm very disappointed," Altman said. "It was a lackluster performance. Our most experienced players were turning it over. We didn't handle the ball."

The players also were disappointed.

"Maybe we got comfortable with the big lead, but we let up," Anthony Beane, who tied Vincent Jackson in turnovers with five, said.

K-State was outrebounded 40-34. Jackson led the squad with six rebounds.

The Cats controlled the first half as the Cubans committed 17 turnovers and were held to only 18 points while K-State scored 36.

In the second half, the Cubans defense forced the Cats into 13 turnovers but was unable to close the gap with K-State.

Jones led the Cats with 18 points, with 13 points within the last 10 minutes of the game. Henson came off the bench to score 16 points, including four three-pointers. Collier scored 15 points.

The regular season begins at 7:30 p.m. Tuesday when the Cats take on Coppin State in Bramlage Coliseum.

SPORTS DIGEST

► RICE TIES LARGENT FOR TD MARK

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — Jerry Rice caught his 100th career scoring pass during the first quarter of the San Francisco 49ers-Philadelphia Eagles game Sunday.

The catch equaled Steve Largent's all-time NFL record.

Rice broke open over the middle, and Steve Young hit him with a 22-yard pass.

Rice matched Largent's record in his eighth season, six years ahead of the pace Largent set during a 14-year career with Seattle.

► FOSTER BREAKS HARRIS' RECORD

CINCINNATI (AP) — In the Pittsburgh Steelers' 21-9 victory Sunday against the Cincinnati Bengals, Steeler running back Barry Foster ran for 102 yards, breaking Franco Harris' single-season record.

Foster broke Harris' 17-year-old club rushing mark on a 21-yard run in the second quarter. He now leads the league with 1,319 rushing yards, 73 yards more than Harris' previous record.

► JAYHAWKS ARE GOING BOWLING

The Kansas Jayhawks are going to a bowl game for the first time since 1981.

The Nebraska Cornhuskers' 33-9 victory over the Oklahoma Sooners Friday afternoon secured KU's spot as the No. 3 team in the conference, giving the Hawks a bid in the Aloha Bowl against Brigham Young.

The game will be played Christmas Day in Honolulu.

NATIONAL FOOTBALL LEAGUE

Chiefs top New York Jets, 23-7

ASSOCIATED PRESS

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. — The Kansas City Chiefs, winless at Giants Stadium before Sunday's contest with the New York Jets, nearly served up their own shutout Sunday in breaking that streak.

A stingy defense and ball control attack carried the Chiefs to a 23-7 victory against the impotent New York Jets.

That victory lifted Kansas City to 8-4, good for first place in the AFC West, and broke an 0-6-1 slump at the home of the Giants and Jets. The Chiefs have won their last four games.

The Jets, who had a total of just 251 yards of offense, did not score until 10:02 remained, when Terance Mathis caught a 10-yard pass from Browning Nagle. It was New York's first touchdown in nine quarters; Mathis also scored the last one, against Cincinnati.

The Jets (3-9) also lost defensive end Dennis Byrd, who was carted off the field with a back injury in the third quarter and later taken to the hospital.

Krieg had touchdown passes of 2 yards to Keith Cash and 4 to Tim Barnett in the third quarter, when Kansas City broke it open. Nick Lowery kicked field goals of 27 and 20 yards in the first half, then made a 38-yarder with 4:17 remaining.

"We've had a good, solid defense and an offense that can run the ball," Krieg said. "And we showed we can throw the ball."

Krieg was 17 for 21 for 222 yards and two touchdowns.

The Chiefs had a total of 96 rushing yards.

Lowery's 20-yarder concluded a 78-yard, 15-play drive that consumed 8:34 of the opening quarter. Erik McMillan's late hit cost New York 15 yards on the drive. But running back Kimble Anders dropped a pass while wide open in the end zone.

A 57-yard, 10-play march that took up 6:13 led to Lowery's 27-yarder in the second period.

A 55-yard pass to Willie Davis on the play after Byrd was injured set up Cash's touchdown. Barnett's score came four plays after a 16-yard pass to J.J. Birden and a 15-yard face-mask penalty on the tackle.

Ken O'Brien started at quarterback for the Jets. But he played only one quarter before reinjuring his thumb.

The Chiefs first-place standing hinges on tonight's contest between the Denver Broncos and the Seattle Seahawks. The Broncos, 7-4, have not yet determined whether John Elway will start.

Byrd injured in collision

ASSOCIATED PRESS

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. — New York Jets defensive end Dennis Byrd suffered some paralysis in his lower body Sunday after colliding with teammate Scott Mersereau.

"He has some neurological injury," team spokesman Frank Ramos said after the game.

Byrd had a CAT scan and was examined by back and spine specialists at Lenox Hill Hospital in New York, but the Jets were unsure whether a further prognosis would be made before Monday.

On the second play of the third quarter, Mersereau and Byrd charged Kansas City Chiefs' quarterback Dave Krieg, who fumbled. The two Jets ran directly into each other, and Byrd's helmet appeared to smack directly into Mersereau's chest and shoulder.

"I was coming from the outside on a stunt, and I went to grab Krieg," Mersereau said. "As I stepped up, the next thing I know, I was hit in the sternum."

"The hit was hard enough to bend me over backward. When I found out it was Dennis — well, my thoughts, my heart and my prayers went out to him."

Mersereau walked off the field, but Byrd stayed on the turf. He was lifted on a stretcher and placed on a golf cart, surrounded by trainers and doctors.

"It makes you reflect on how fragile things are and what is important and what's not," said Jets coach Bruce Coslet. "Our hopes and prayers are to wish Dennis the best."

CROSS COUNTRY

Cats run behind at NCAA meet

FRANK KLEEMANN

Collegian

The K-State runners finished their season at the NCAA cross country championships Nov. 23 at Bloomington, Ind., placing the men's team 15th and the women's team 21st.

The champions were Arkansas on the men's side and Villanova on the women's.

After the races, Cat coach John Capriotti, who coached the harriers for the last time before working with Nike Inc., said the teams competed hard. But the day wasn't all satisfying, he said.

"The men had a pretty fair day and still got 15th," he said. "If just one guy runs better, we automatically move up in the standings. Realistically, we could have gotten as high as ninth."

Senior Mike Becker, second best Cat on the 10,000-meter Indiana University cross country course, said the team hoped to place among the top 10.

"Actually, we planned to be a lot better," he said. "Everybody on the team had an average day."

Junior Francis O'Neill was leading the team, finishing 38th with a time of 31:56.

Becker followed him in 66th with a time of 32:24:20 seconds in front of 85th-placed Chris Unthank. Anthony Williams got 120th, Ryan Clive-Smith 147th, David Haskell 152nd and Yared Berhane 164th.

Overall, Becker said, the men's team had a good year, finishing second at the Big Eight meet and first at the NCAA District V race.

K-State's women tried to follow the race plan they had the entire season, staying together and pushing each other to the front. But through the big field, the tactic didn't work out quite as well as planned.

The Cats, at 21st, improved from last year by just one place.

"They stayed together pretty well, but there are just more runners here to get in between them," Capriotti said. "I think the women ran about like they have been this season. This race was very similar to their performances at the Big Eight and District V championships."

'Malcolm X' goes beyond cinema

Morehouse College students learn about leader outside of movie portrayal

ASSOCIATED PRESS

"Malcolm was our manhood, our living, black manhood! This was his meaning to his people. ..."
— Actor Ossie Davis, eulogizing Malcolm X, 1965.

WASHINGTON — At all-black, all-male Morehouse College in Atlanta, 75 freshmen grind out papers for History 111 on "The Relevance of the Views of Malcolm X in Today's Society."

Five pages, based only on Malcolm's speeches and writings, due the day Morehouse alum Spike Lee premieres "Malcolm X," his epic film on the Muslim leader's life.

"I was determined my students would know something about Malcolm before the movie," says instructor Herman Mason Jr. "What Spike presents is going to shape the minds of so many young people who are not going to read."

For the students, Malcolm X is a figure who aptly voices their alienation and hope for redemption.

They track with wonder his metamorphosis from Malcolm Little to Malcolm X to El Hajj Malik el-Shabazz. They want to be Malcolm, mimicking the goatee, horn-rimmed glasses and natty dress, but adopting only bits and pieces of his total philosophy.

"I'm less interested in Malcolm as a hero than I am in his life as a window. A lot of brothers are going to be wearing the X, the glasses and all. I'm hoping younger brothers will study his model and embrace the substance," said Robert Franklin, director of black church studies at Emory University in Atlanta. "I hope his life can open up a larger arena of study, and white America will become more sensitized to the black experience because of this."

Malcolm X evolved from a drug abuser, petty thief and convict into a disciplined follower of Islam who urged black power "by any means necessary." He called whites "blue-eyed devils," only to retract that sentiment after a pilgrimage to Mecca among Muslims of all races.

Born Malcolm Little on May 19, 1925, in Omaha, Neb., he spent his childhood in Lansing, Mich. He was his seventh-grade class president and aspired to be a lawyer, but was discouraged by a white teacher who told him he couldn't go to college because he was black and suggested he try carpentry instead.

As a teen-ager, Little migrated to Boston and Harlem, where he became a nightclub waiter and picked up an education in hustling just by listening to some of the customers.

Malcolm then became a pimp, drug addict and burglar. While serving a prison sentence for burglary, he re-educated himself, copying the dictionary page-by-page and reading practically every book he could find.

He also discovered the teachings of Elijah Muhammad, leader of the Nation of Islam. After being released from prison in 1952, Malcolm dropped the Little surname and adopted "X," as did all of Muhammad's followers, to signify rejection of their white slave masters' names.

In two years, Malcolm was named minister of the Harlem mosque and emerged as a national spokesman, advocating that blacks own their own businesses, learn their history.

"What's unusual about Malcolm X is his religious conversion kept developing. His earlier perspective, he saw, was too narrow. He broadened it," said David Leigh, a Seattle University professor who studies historical figures who experienced significant life changes. "Toward the end, he combined his insistence on black pride with his willingness to work with all races and all people."

Envisioning a more universal worship of Islam, Malcolm subsequently split with Muhammad and founded the Organization for Afro-American Unity in 1964. But he didn't live long enough to get the group off the ground. He was assassinated at the age of 39 at a Harlem rally Feb. 21, 1965.

"He was not the hatred-filled man that he may have been prior to going to Mecca," Mason said. "He was a courageous man to have come out and spoke about the goings-on with Elijah Muhammad. There is Malcolm the myth and Malcolm the man."

Pianist to tickle ivories Tuesday night at McCain

DAN GRAFEL

Collegian

Pianist Randall Sulton will perform at 8 p.m. Tuesday in All Faiths Chapel.

Sulton, piano instructor at Kansas Wesleyan University, will play classical pieces written by Haydn, Schubert, Scriabin and Schumann.

"This is going to be an excellent performance," music instructor Virginia Houser said.

Sulton, a South Carolina native, is in his third year at Kansas Wesleyan, where he currently teaches, performs and maintains a private studio.

He received his master's degree in music at Florida State University and is currently a doctoral candidate at the University of Texas at Austin.

As an undergraduate at Converse College in Spartanburg, S.C., he was the recipient of the Walter Spry Piano Scholarship and also received the Robert I. Woodside Award as Outstanding Freshman in Music. He also won concerto competitions as a member of the Spartanburg Symphony.

Sulton said he ended up in Kansas simply because there was a job available at Kansas Wesleyan.

He said he couldn't say exactly how he got started with the piano, only that he just started to play as a youngster.

"I started in fifth or sixth grade," he said. "That's pretty late for most pianists."

2 Topekans killed over pool game

Double homicide first in Lawrence since the 1960s

ASSOCIATED PRESS

LAWRENCE — A dispute over who controlled a pool table at a bar led to the fatal shooting of two men — the first double homicide here since the 1960s, police said.

The dead men, who were from Topeka, probably would not have been in Lawrence Friday, their employer said, but they had decided to put off a vacation and do a job.

"It all happened because of a pool game," said Lyle Schiefelbein, a Topeka contractor who employed the two carpet layers. "It's a hard way to go."

Killed were Jerry Thompson, 32, and Jim Buswell, 42.

Thompson was dead in the parking lot of Henry T's Bar and Grill. Buswell died late Friday night at a hospital.

Schiefelbein said he did a lot of work in Lawrence, and Henry T's was a favorite place for his employees to go after work.

Police said Thompson, Buswell and another man were playing pool when two Lawrence men approached them.

Thompson and Buswell left quarters on the table when they went to another part of the bar, and an argument ensued when they got back.

A fight broke out. Bar manager Curt Melzer said he and two other employees threw the men out.

Melzer said he knew the fight would continue.

"The minute they walked out the door, I came back in and called 911," he said.

Shots were fired before authorities could arrive. A suspect is being held without bond pending the filing of formal charges.

Witnesses said the suspect shot the two Topeka men in the northeast corner of the parking lot.

The suspect apparently did not have a weapon in the bar, but he retrieved it from his car. The suspect dropped the gun in the parking lot.

KGAY of Denver targets music, news to homosexuals; available only by satellite

ASSOCIATED PRESS

DENVER — The manager of a new coast-to-coast lesbian and gay radio station said listeners will find plenty of music from homosexual artists and issue-oriented news.

But those looking for titillation should tune out.

"People will be bored before they will be titillated," Clay Henderson said Saturday night, soon after KGAY went on the air.

"There is nothing that will go out on the airwaves that will offend my sweet, little old Republican mother in Brazoria County, Texas," he said.

Broadcasting from a tiny Denver studio crammed on opening night with TV, magazine and radio reporters, Henderson said investors pumped $1 million into the station to bring mainstream radio for a gay and lesbian audience to market.

The station isn't available without a satellite dish. Though the nation has other radio stations that offer gay and lesbian programming, KGAY is expected to reach an estimated 7.5 million homes in the United States, Canada, Mexico and the Caribbean.

Direct broadcast satellite reception will be an option on some late 1993 and 1994 automobiles. And the station is working to encourage cable systems to carry KGAY as background music for their information channels.

Specifically lesbian and gay programming is scheduled for about 65 hours each week, coupled with 105 hours of progressive rock music.

The station's news programming includes reports from the Albuquerque-based Gay Net News Service, Henderson said.

The station is not governed by the Federal Communications Commission, but Henderson said

Violence in Germany blazes

ASSOCIATED PRESS

■ At least 16 people have died this year in some 1,800 extreme rightist attacks throughout Germany.

BERLIN — A refugee center in western Germany was firebombed Sunday as violence against foreigners continued despite a police crackdown on neo-Nazis and Chancellor Helmut Kohl's call for tolerance.

In Turkey, German flags were burned amid cries of "Down with skinheads!" and "Death to murderers!" at the funeral Sunday for three Turkish victims of the right-wing extremist violence in Germany.

In Jerusalem, the Israeli Cabinet denounced German racist and anti-Semitic attacks and demanded German officials fight right-wing extremism with "the full force of the law."

The government has taken measures to curb the violence, including banning a radical-right group, but has been criticized for not doing enough.

In an attack early Sunday in Lingen, near the Dutch border, two firebombs were thrown at buildings housing 20 refugees, but no injuries were reported and damage was minor. Officials offered a $3,100 reward for clues leading to the arrests of the attackers.

In Eberswalde, 25 miles northeast of Berlin, a fire around midnight Saturday destroyed a barracks housing 60 refugees. A watchman suffered smoke inhalation. Police were investigating the cause of the fire.

In an interview Sunday on Deutschlandfunk radio, Kohl vowed Germany will use the full force of the law against "the radical right mob."

But he said proposed constitutional changes to limit the number of refugees and toughen Germany's liberal asylum policy would not resolve the problems of racism and anti-foreigner violence.

He said Germany's prosperity would have been impossible without help from foreign workers such as the Turks, Germany's largest minority group, many of whom were recruited to work in the labor-short 1960s.

In Carsamba, Turkey, thousands attended the funeral of an ethnic Turkish woman and two children killed in a firebombing attack on their home in Moelln, Germany, Nov. 23, Turkey's semi-official Anatolia news agency reported.

Anatolia said burning German flags were thrown from houses as the coffins were carried to the graveyard.

A German Embassy representative as well as four Turkish government ministers and several parliamentary deputies attended the funeral, Anatolia reported.

Retailers report big turkey weekend buying

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Americans shopped enthusiastically during the Thanksgiving weekend, giving retailers an encouraging start to the holiday season.

Big retailers reported Sunday that business was up sharply from the depressed levels of a year ago. They also said sales remained weak in California, which has lagged behind the rest of the country in recovering from the recession.

"We expected strong sales for the post-Thanksgiving weekend and it was strong, with the exception of California," said Kenneth Macke, chairman of Dayton Hudson Corp.

"The buying mood was more upbeat than it was the last two years," said Matt Howard, senior vice president for marketing for Sears, Roebuck and Co. "We were quite pleased with the business. It was a very good kickoff for the holiday season."

But retailers also remained wary, perhaps remembering the disappointing holiday seasons of 1989, 1990 and 1991.

"At this point, we're still cautiously optimistic about the balance of the season," Howard said.

Dayton Hudson's strongest business was at its lower-priced Target discount stores, spokeswoman Ann Barkeley said. The company's Mervyn's clothing stores didn't fare as well, and the most popular items sold there included gifts within a specific price range, such as under $10 or under $20.

But other signs indicated a potentially strong shopping season.

Sears reported strong sales for such "big-ticket" items as major appliances, as well as for video games like Sega Genesis and Super Nintendo. Target stores reported strong sales of electronic merchandise and jewelry.

And at Pier 1 Imports Inc., shoppers "seemed to be buying the higher-priced items," chairman Clark Johnson said.

"We had a great weekend," Johnson said, adding that he was raising his sales projections for the season.

Washington figures blame alcohol often

Means Committee, didn't seek re-election and later campaigned against alcoholism.

Other Washington figures who have blamed their conduct on alcohol:

■ White House aide-turned-lobbyist Michael Deaver defended himself against criminal charges of lying by saying alcoholism impaired his memory about the meetings and conversations he was asked about. The jury in U.S. District Court rejected Deaver's alcohol defense, and President Reagan's former deputy chief of staff was convicted, fined $100,000 and sentenced to 1,500 hours of community service.

■ Former Rep. Robert Bauman, R-Md., blamed "heavy drinking" and "acute alcoholism" for conduct that led to his arrest in 1980 on charges of having solicited sex from a 16-year-old boy. Contending his sobriety had been restored, Bauman ran for re-election and was defeated.

In Packwood's case, he said Friday that he realized he had problems and would seek professional advice "in connection with my use of alcohol."

Packwood didn't admit to making unwanted sexual advances against 10 female accusers. However, he didn't deny the allegations as he had to the Washington Post on Oct. 30, four days before winning re-election.

"Whether alcohol was a factor in these incidents, I do not know," Packwood's statement said.

ESSENTIALS

'Really cool' people sometimes aren't after a few drinks

YOU'RE ASKING ME?

by Cassandra Duveaux

DEAR CASSANDRA,

I met this guy who I thought was really cool. We went out a few times, and I slept with him. Last weekend at a party, he and his brother locked me in the bathroom and both tried to rape me until other people banged on the door until it opened.

They both said "I wanted it." The worst part about it is that they were serious. I really think they would have raped me if no one would have been outside the door. They thought it was funny, too. How could this guy do this to me after we had been together? He seemed so nice. What can I do? How can this be stopped?

Another Statistic

DEAR ANOTHER STATISTIC,

You fail to mention whether or not alcohol was involved. I have nothing against using alcohol in moderation, however, in many situations like yours, alcohol plays a significant role in altering the behavior of people who are normally "really cool."

Pick your friends and parties carefully from now on. Do not go into rooms alone. It is best to stay close (in a general sense) to one or two female friends you trust during these gatherings. And finally, it sounds to me like there were enough witnesses to corroborate your story. Do not hesitate to bring charges against the sort of men you encountered at the party. It is the quickest way to slam the brakes on this kind of disgusting behavior.

DEAR CASSANDRA,

Some of the pick-up lines I have heard my friends use on women down in Aggieville make me want to pretend I don't know them. One of them told a woman walking by that the alphabet had been rewritten so as to put "U and I together last." She just looked at him and, without breaking stride, said, "You failed Comp 1, didn't you?"

I have never heard of anyone who was "picked-up" by a pick-up line. In the best case scenario, the woman just starts laughing at what a fool you just made of yourself, and you go from there. That's great when it happens, but of course the risk is a full-fledged, in-your-face rejection that may take a while to drink off or live down.

I guess I'm asking you if you think pick-up lines are all just a facade, another game we play because we're too afraid to ask for what we really want? Isn't the honest approach just another guise for lust? What pick-up lines (if any) would work on you?

Sincerely (and with apologies),
Lust Guise

DEAR LUST GUISE,

The so-called "pick-up line" is something used by the young, the inexperienced and the emotionally insecure. They are used, not out of fear to ask for what we really want, but out of fear of revealing who/what we really are (the inner self). As you aptly signed your letter, it is a "guise" used by those who lack the self confidence to handle the rejection.

The honest approach, on the other hand, can hardly be a guise, otherwise it would not be honest. I prefer to use the phrase, "Just be yourself — with all the flaws and imperfections which that entails." The best sexual attraction is the natural beauty that comes through when we remove the mask.

Pick-up lines (or letters) do not work with me. Nice try, though.

Grain science has new leadership

He said the department's focus would not change with the new department head.

"The undergraduate curriculum works with industry advisory committees to get students prepared for industry work."

Hahn said he agreed, stating the No. 1 priority as the training of students.

"We will focus on the best possible job of training people for productive and enjoyable careers," Hahn said.

He said he isn't looking to change the department.

"We will try to do better what we are already doing."

Johnson said Hahn's experience is important to the department.

"He'll do an excellent job because of his energy, drive and vision of education and industry," Johnson said.

Black gunmen open fire in country club

The government, reacting to the country club deaths and other weekend violence, said in a statement it cannot successfully deal with violence alone.

It called for the cooperation "of all our communities and of all political leaders ... There must be a common resolve that our society will no longer tolerate violence."

Ray Radue, a member of parliament, and his wife were attending the dinner and wine-tasting at the club when an undetermined number of blacks attacked the dining room and a bar just before 10 p.m.

"The result was absolute carnage," Radue said. "The attack was a totally unprovoked act of terrorism against innocent people."

The attackers rolled grenades into the dining room and the bar, then opened automatic-weapons fire in an assault that lasted less than a minute, witnesses said.

Radue, who was slightly injured by shrapnel, said there were three attackers, while police put the number at five.

Two white couples were killed, police said, and 17 people were injured, several seriously.

About 60 people, mostly middle-aged and elderly whites, were in the dining room and bar. The club is integrated, and there were black guests at the bar.

The country club is just outside the Ciskei black homeland, where black Ciskei troops shot dead 28 ANC supporters during a march to the homeland capital of Bisho, three miles from King William's Town.

agencies to make it easier for homeless people to get available help, Ray said.

This involves finding temporary shelters and programs to reduce financial burdens on the homeless, he said.

Hager said he has noticed differences in the three communities' responses to the homeless problems.

Salina's previous progress in helping the homeless has been good, he said.

But he believed Lawrence officials have ignored the problem, fearing shelters may bring more homeless their way.

"I'd say Hutchinson is somewhere in the middle," Hager said.

"Hutchinson's social response has been that they are pretty aware. When they realize there are problems, they do something about it."

In addition to the three students who are leading each project, Ray said they have cooperation from a large group of people, including other members of the Community Service Program.

"I think some things we hope from student members to accomplish are to find out how it happens, and how it can be remedied," Ray said.

"It's all about citizenship and how everybody is connected together as a part of the community," he said.

"We have to ask ourselves as human beings, 'Am I my brother's keeper, or am I just my keeper?'"

Letter Refused by Opinion Editor You Judge Why!

Dear Editor:

It is unfortunate that individuals like Joe Grunke, a narrow-minded, single-issue fool with tunnel vision and a vindictive axe to grind would be elected to represent the graduate school.

I think I can speak for most alumni and taxpayers in Kansas that it gets very irritating to listen to whiners like Grunke and Sharon Grieb who would shift even more of their educational costs to others, mainly the taxpayers and benevolent alumni giving to the KSU Foundation. They should be reminded that they are going to a land grant university where taxpayers already pay for over 66 percent of their educational costs, according to the budget office.

The success of the football program has already had a positive impact on how K-State is perceived nationwide. Whether you like athletics or not, that favorable image will help all students when they leave K-State to get a taste of the real world. My son was a two-term student senator and lobbied hard to get the senate to pass the original fee. Since he was killed in a tragic accident in April, I would hope his efforts were not in vain.

Grunke and Grieb (all students for that matter) are getting an educational bargain based on national statistics. If they are that unhappy with their educational cost I would suggest they go to a university where they're asked to pay a larger share of their educational expenses. Then perhaps they could justify their complaints.

It took Galileo 16 years to master the universe. You have one night.

It seems unfair. The genius had all that time. While you have a few short hours to learn your sun spots from your satellites before the dreaded astronomy exam.

On the other hand, Vivarin gives you the definite advantage. It helps keep you awake and mentally alert for hours. Safely and conveniently. So even when the subject matter's dull, your mind will stay razor sharp.

If Galileo had used Vivarin, maybe he could have mastered the solar system faster, too.

Voter turnout reaches record

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — A record number of Kansans voted in this year's presidential election.

And four candidates for president received the first write-in votes ever counted by the state.

Monday, the state Board of Canvassers certified results from the Nov. 3 general election, and its action replaced unofficial figures with the final, official ones.

Those results showed that 1,157,236 voters cast ballots in the presidential race, or 84.8 percent of the 1,364,418 Kansans who were registered.

"You can't be anything but pleased with the way people turned out," said John Reinhart, press secretary for Secretary of State Bill Graves, chief state elections officer.

Four write-in candidates received a total of 179 votes, and three others received none at all.

The 1992 Legislature enacted a law that allows write-in candidates to have their votes counted if they state their candidacy with the secretary of state's office before the election. Before, the state didn't count write-in votes for president.

Republican President Bush carried the state, receiving 449,951 votes, or 38.9 percent of those cast. President-elect Bill Clinton, a Democrat, received 33.7 percent of the votes cast, or 390,434 votes.

Independent candidate Ross Perot received 312,358 votes, or 27 percent. The fourth candidate listed on the ballot, Libertarian Andre Marrou, received 4,314 votes, or four-tenths of 1 percent.

Under the bridge

David Darling, professor of agricultural economics, and his wife, Carol, walk their dogs under the K-177 bridge over the Kansas River Monday afternoon. The couple and dogs Tasha and Muffin were following the Manhattan Linear Park Trail. The Darlings said they rarely take the dogs for walks there, but do so every once in a while for variety.

Victim rights protected

ASSOCIATED PRESS

■ On Nov. 3, 84.4 percent of Kansans voted in favor of the victims' rights constitutional amendment.

TOPEKA — Law-enforcement agencies can refuse to make public the names of sexual-assault victims, Attorney General Bob Stephan said Monday.

Stephan said in a legal opinion that victims' rights laws and a recently approved constitutional amendment for victims' rights would permit — but not require — law-enforcement agencies to withhold a victim's name, address and telephone number in sex-crime cases.

The names of crime victims are contained on the first page of the Standard Offense Report, which is open to the public. Law-enforcement agencies use the report to provide information about crimes.

The opinion was requested by Sedgwick County Attorney Nola Foulston after the Wichita Police Department declined to release the name of a woman who allegedly was sexually assaulted in a hospital.

"Kansas journalists have chosen thousands of times not to identify a sexual-assault victim without their consent because we want to respect victims' rights," said Bill Hirschman, president of the Kansas professional chapter of the Society of Professional Journalists.

► U.N. TROOPS MAY GO TO SOMALIA

UNITED NATIONS (AP) — Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali on Monday recommended limited use of military force to deliver humanitarian supplies to starving Somalia.

He did not rule out an American offer to commit

30,000 troops but indicated a preference for a U.N.-led force.

In Washington, a Pentagon source said a three-ship, 1,800-member U.S. Marine Corps contingent slated for duty in the Persian Gulf is prepared to set up an airstrip in Mogadishu suitable for U.S. troops.

► EXXON EXEC KILLER GETS 95 YEARS

TRENTON, N.J. (AP) — A former policeman who killed an Exxon executive in a botched $18.5-million ransom kidnapping was sentenced Monday to life in prison.

Arthur Seale received a maximum 95-year sentence for federal charges. Seale, who pleaded guilty to kidnapping and killing Exxon International President Sidney Reso, was denied any chance of parole.

U.S. District Judge Garrett Brown Jr. also fined him $1.75 million, although the defense said there was little chance Seale could pay anything.

Arts and sciences calls for faculty salary hike

JENNIFER BEALS

Collegian

EDITOR'S NOTE: The Kansas Board of Regents has called for new Role and Aspirations Statements from each state university. This is the eighth story in a series on what K-State's colleges are doing to fulfill this mandate.

The College of Arts and Sciences is proposing 23 aspirations and six changes, including de-emphasis in three programs.

Aspirations include requiring all colleges to support the College of Arts and Sciences in sharing costs of basic courses such as speech and composition. This is due to costs and student overload.

The Nov. 6 draft stated: "Collegewide in fiscal year 1991, we generated over 275,000 credit hours — more than the total number of all credit hours produced by the other colleges combined."

Another goal is increasing faculty salaries to strengthen recruitment and stop the loss of productive instructors.

"The salaries in the college are 22 percent below reasonable," Associate Dean Judith Zivanovic said. "We're the college most significantly affected, and it's something the college emphasizes."

The modern languages department proposes adding one or more faculty positions, enhancing Latin American studies, supplying a state-of-the-art language lab, and providing summer grants to internationalize curriculum and enhance a study-abroad program.

Bradley Shaw, head of the modern languages department, said the department's growth reflects national trends.

"There has been greater numbers of students enrolled in foreign languages," Shaw said, "and I think that has a lot to do with economic interests and the fact that we're no longer being isolationists, but have an awareness of others."

Zivanovic said the funds for such additions and enhancements could come from two outlets.

"We would have to make a

Counseling the choice

Women can seek unbiased pregnancy advice

MEGAN MULLIKIN

Pregnancy counseling is available on and off campus for women who want help deciding whether to have an abortion, keep the baby or give it up for adoption.

Two places at Lafene Health Center offer counseling concerning unplanned pregnancies.

The Women's Clinic is usually the first place a woman gets counseling, because this is where many women discover they are pregnant, clinic director Gail Senock said.

Senock said the clinic prefers that women come back in to get the results of the pregnancy test.

"Usually the woman knows what she wants to do when she comes in for the test. It might not be pleasant, but she knows," Senock said.

University Counseling Services in Lafene is the second place on campus where pregnancy advising is available. Counselors are available on an appointment or walk-in basis.

Although the counseling center is not specifically set up for pregnancy counseling, Jan Wheeler, on-call counselor and psychology intern, said anyone who needs support can be accommodated.

Counselors stressed they leave the decision up to the woman and do not influence her decision in any way.

Abortion law won't get review

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court sustained women's basic right to abortion Monday, voting 6-3 against reviving a 1990 Guam law that would have prohibited nearly all such operations.

The justices refused to review lower court rulings that had declared the U.S. territory's sweeping law unconstitutional.

Monday's action, which activists on both sides of the national debate had expected, marked the first time in 20 years the high court declined

Radical group says it's responsible for attack at club

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KING WILLIAM'S TOWN, South Africa — A radical black group claimed responsibility Monday for a hit-and-run raid on a country club Christmas party.

An unidentified caller claiming to be from the Azanian People's Liberation Army telephoned police Monday and said the group carried out the ambush.

"We're going to hit harder now," the caller told police.

It was the worst attack on white civilians in South Africa since the 1980s.

The attack Saturday night, which left four dead and about 20 wounded, has shocked the country's 5 million whites.

Black and white politicians quickly reaffirmed their intentions to press ahead with efforts to stop the violence.

But the raid was a startling reminder that even tranquil backwaters such as King William's Town, a tidy place of wide, tree-lined avenues and Colonial-style houses, are not immune to the country's political tumult.

Some survivors said the assailants smiled as they rolled grenades into the dining hall and then opened automatic gunfire on middle-aged and elderly diners at the King William's Town Golf Club for a Christmas dinner and wine-tasting party.

There were blacks and whites in the dining hall, and some of the injured were black.

Police said they could not confirm that APLA carried out the attack in the town, 625 miles south of Johannesburg, but they were treating the claim seriously.

APLA is the military wing of the Pan Africanist Congress, a radical, relatively small, black nationalist group.

Asked for official comment, PAC secretary general Benny Alexander refused to either confirm or deny his group's involvement.

He accused authorities of racism in their response to the shooting.

"There is a lot of international hullabaloo around the attack, purely because white people have died," he said.

About 9,000 blacks have died in political violence since 1989, and more than 20 blacks were killed in weekend fighting across the country.

But political violence has been mainly confined to black townships, and most attacks are blamed on rivalries between black political groups.

The King William's Town attack was the worst politically motivated, organized assault on white civilians since President F.W. de Klerk came to power in 1989 and began dismantling apartheid.

STATE Kansas churches combat hunger

STEPHEN MCKEE
Collegian

A donation made in Kansas can alleviate hunger across state lines.

United Methodist 15th Annual Roundup for Hunger will serve the needy people of Kansas, Mexico and Haiti Saturday in conjunction with the 340 Kansas East Conference churches and Heifer Project International.

Many area Methodist churches are donating needed items, said Bill Willis, information committee chairman for the round-up. Donations include cash, which mainly goes to the support of missions in Haiti and Mexico, or commercially prepared food, clothing or kits, which are used in domestic programs.

Domestic programs assisting in hunger alleviation include Sunshine Breakfast Club in Olathe, Wesley House in Pittsburg, Crosslines in Kansas City, Ogden Friendship House and Junction City Korean Church.

"The food stays in our pantry at the church. In conjunction with four other churches, our food goes to the Flint Hills Breadbasket," said Sherry Hooper, co-chairwoman of the missions commission at First United Methodist Church.

Sewing kits, health kits, school kits, layettes and toys are also needed around the state, Hooper said.

Heifer Project International assists in the project by distributing food-producing animals. It furnishes an animal and provides training and assistance in its care.

Families give the first female animal born back to Heifer Project International, Willis said, to ensure the roundup provides for the future.

Once the donations are collected around the conference, the individual churches take them by truck to the main round-up. At the round-up, donations are given to groups that have expressed need.

"A committee assesses the needs of different areas and communicates with them. They find out exactly where the need is, and the areas are offered a chance to say, 'I want this,'" Willis said.

The area churches are optimistic about this year's donation total, Cooper said.

"We don't have the final numbers yet, but we think it will be close to last year. Last year we collected over 1,000 pounds of food and took two truckloads of food and clothing to Lawrence."

Vigil highlights World AIDS Day

Community gathers to remember loved ones, talk about AIDS

SHAWN BRUCE
Collegian

Tears combined with hugs and candlelight to help commemorate World AIDS Day in a campus vigil Monday night.

About 25 students and area residents came together in Danforth Chapel on the eve of today's official observation to listen to guest speakers and music.

They lit candles, both in memory of those who have died and to reaffirm their commitment to fighting the disease.

Marcene Wachsicht of Clay Center spoke about the pain of watching her son, David, die from the disease.

"In March of 1987, David told us he was diagnosed with AIDS," she said. "In January of 1988, he moved home."

"We quickly learned how painful and devastating AIDS is."

Wachsicht said her son went from weighing 160 pounds, when he was healthy, to 60 pounds, when he died in June 1988.

"I didn't know anyone could suffer so much," she said.

Ending suffering like David's is still far down the road, said Dr. Larry Moeller, medical director at Lafene Health Center.

"We need to have access to medications sooner," he said.

"Dr. William Mayo once said, 'Don't spare the horses when human life is at stake.'"

Moeller said that by the year 2000, as many as 110 million people worldwide could be infected, especially in Third World countries, putting an incredible strain on those involved.

DARREN WHITLEY/Collegian

Andy Cordero, director of the minority engineering program, takes time to remember friends who have died from AIDS during the World AIDS Day Memorial candlelight vigil Monday night in Danforth Chapel. Today is World AIDS Day.

"Terminal illness is an awful tough situation," he said.

"Terminal care is awful tough as well. We need to develop that sense of family — large family — and a sense of community."

"More and more of us are going to know someone who's infected."

Wachsicht offered some advice on how to show compassion for people with AIDS.

"Let them know you care," she said.

"Let them know you'll be there for them. Hugs are very, very good."

"I was never a hugging person until my son came home. Now, that's my way of giving to so many people."

Cows let the chips fall where they may

REBECCA OLIVAS

Students won prizes as cows unloaded their "chips" in bingo squares Monday night in Weber Arena.

Agriculture ambassadors and representatives presented K-State's first Cow Chip Bingo and chili feed.

Players purchased tickets for the bingo square of their choice, and they won when the cows chose their square.

First prize, a pair of ropers, went to Matt Perrier, freshman in agriculture. Second prize, a $25 gift certificate to S-Bar-J Western Clothiers, went to Anita Kimball, sophomore in elementary education. Third prize was an agricultural calendar, won by Ryan Michaelis, senior in animal science.

Larry Erpelding, associate director of academic programs, and William Amstein, agriculture alumni coordinator, acted as "line judges" for the bingo game.

"The students did it all," Erpelding said. "They did a nice job in carrying out the planning and the activities in the event."

"This is the first year they've done it. The thought was, if it was successful, they would continue it in the future."

"It was a lot of work," said Stephanie Loeppke, event chairwoman and senior in animal science.

Organizers said a number of details had to be taken care of,

Day marks explosion of AIDS

THE ISSUE

World AIDS Day is being observed to bring further attention to a disease growing unchecked.

WE SUGGEST

The entire year merits the attention this one day gives to AIDS.

Today is World AIDS Day. And AIDS is indeed traveling around the world — anyone could be the next person infected by the HIV virus.

It no longer affects only Third World countries. Or gays. Or junkies and other "outside groups." The list of people at risk is no longer limited to specific groups.

And the number of infected people is rising each year. According to Donna Sweet, a Wichita physician who treats HIV-positive people, more than 110 million adults worldwide will be infected by the end of this century.

People who still ignore AIDS and the possibility of contracting the disease are living in a world of illusion.

AIDS exists — we have to deal with it. We have to take it seriously.

We have to accept people with the disease and integrate them back into daily life. When someone is infected, you can't see it on the outside. There won't be a flashing red siren on his or her forehead.

Every person you deal with could have AIDS. It could be your boss or your mail carrier. That's the reality.

We need to increase education on how to avoid and limit the risk of getting infected, because worldwide education about AIDS and safe sex is still not commonplace. Ignorance will exist so long as society denies providing for public education about the disease.

It is as important as any other education today.

"The World Health Organization has called for a twenty-fold increase in spending to combat the AIDS virus. This is itself is reason enough to come to the realization that this disease may be the worst the human race has yet to face.

Abstinence, proper use of condoms and routine testing are the ways to control further spread of AIDS.

AIDS awareness and prevention should be a lifelong endeavor, not just a one-day shot.

THANK YOU

Many people made 37 Seconds successful

Editor,

I would like to thank the following people and organizations who helped with "37 Seconds of Silence" during the Iowa State-K-State football game: Bruce van de Velde, Matt McMillen, Coach Bill Snyder and the K-State football team, Ben Rohrer and the K-State Marching Band, the K-State cheerleading squad, the Pridettes, Scott Johnson and Kevin Hupe.

With your help, the demonstration went off without any problem. Again, thank you, and please help remember the 37.

administrators are pushing a pro-life viewpoint is without merit. Clearwater does not even have a Catholic church. Your portrayal of Keith Pauly, the high-school principal, is appalling. Questioning the integrity of a man of his commitment and experience is ridiculous. The school board and administrators have not intentionally omitted the pro-choice side of the issue. In fact, six years ago, during my freshman year, Planned Parenthood visited the Clearwater health classes to speak about birth control alternatives.

Many students will only have the knowledge they gain through material and discussion in the classroom to make objective decisions about birth control and abortion. We should commend those schools trying to teach students the facts of life.

STUDENT FEE

Don't choose your college for its athletics

Editor,

I have to agree with the content of the Nov. 23 letter from Tracy Mader. She was right in stating that a school's good standing in athletics is a way of increasing enrollment.

This is a sad fact. If students choose to attend a particular institution based on how well its athletic teams perform, then they lack good judgment. These unfortunate individuals are just throwing their parents' hard-earned money away.

Maybe these individuals should go back home to Mom and Dad and suck their thumbs until they grow up and can make responsible decisions.

Being from Nebraska, I sure as hell didn't choose to attend K-State based on its performance in athletics. I chose to attend because K-State has a very reputable agricultural program that is known worldwide. If I based my decision on who has the best football or volleyball programs in the Big Eight, I would be wearing red instead of purple.

It is a sad day when people base major decisions in their lives on such unimportant things.

HOMECOMING

Lack of results left many in the dark

Editor,

This is regarding the results of the Homecoming contests and the ambassador election. Where were the results? The point is that there were none.

The Collegian is a student newspaper, and the students want to know the results of the events that they helped take place in or in which they participated. The paper advertised the Homecoming events a couple of days in advance and had a whole page telling who the ambassador candidates were. Unless you went to the football game, you would never know who won the Homecoming contest or who were the pair chosen as ambassadors. I had to ask in class who won. And even then, no one knew.

I suggest that you follow through with your stories, schedules and subjects that are important to the student body.

SEXISM

Religious folks need to get it figured out

Editor,

John, John — I know how tough it is to find a woman around here. But believe me, arguing that they simply ought to submit to us isn't going to help.

And to come back saying "Wait, you don't understand, I mean you're supposed to submit as the ancient Greeks understood it" emphatically is not going to improve your chances.

This is the same columnist, remember, who earlier explained away contradictions in biblical religion on the grounds that modern scholars often don't know what the ancient texts mean. Or in some cases, even what they say.

The revealed word of God, that is. When you guys finally get it sorted out, then get back to us about how he wants you to run our lives.

In the meantime, keep writing. With any luck, you'll make even some respectable, professed Christians wonder what kind of pathology they're lending a good name to.

TOLES

Are free condoms really the answer?

So, fantasy imitates life. Let's get real.

A fictional high school becomes the center of attention

Imagine, if you will, a palace of American academia. A jewel of secondary learning nestled among the fruited plain. Let's call this place Mid-America High School.

Mid-America High is a nice enough place to send teen-agers to prepare for college, the military or vocational training. Parents sending their young ones to this institute dare to dream of raising well-adjusted and functional human beings into an ideal of adulthood, whatever that ideal is.

Also imagine that Mid-America High has just become a cornerstone of controversy by distributing free condoms to its student body. This decision to jump on the safe sex bandwagon turns into something more troublesome than anticipated.

PTA meetings are fired and charred with scolding debate among parents, teachers and even students. The local commotion stirs with such vigor that Mid-America High becomes a newsworthy figure of national attention.

Major networks — ABC, CBS, NBC, CNN, CBN, even MTV — flock to Mid-America High to investigate the monumental uproar. The chaos multiplies as the school is infiltrated by journalists from the New York Times, USA Today, the Chicago Tribune, the Collegian and yes, the National Inquirer.

One fortunate broadcast journalist, Larry "Guns" Navarone, from MTV competitor, Hot Vids TV (HVTV) News, scores a lucky interview with some of the students of Mid-America High. Before Larry breaks his arm patting himself on the back for outsmarting Murphy Brown, he decides to tape his interview. It goes something like this.

Larry: This is Larry "Guns" Navarone, America's favorite Gladiator-turned-broadcast journalist, coming to you from Mid-America High. I have with me now students who, where through an act of mercy and understanding, have received the free condoms to promote safe sex.

Let's skip all the bull and cut to the chase. Students are where the action is. After all, we're talking about their lives, are we not?

Right now I'm talking to Bob. Bob's a little sad today. He just came back from the health clinic with bad news. Turns out he contracted AIDS from his sweet little girlfriend whom he met in history class. Bob, what did you do wrong? Did you forget your rubbers, oops I mean condoms?

Bob: No way, man! I remembered everything I learned from MTV and the Planned Parenthood spokeswoman; oops, I mean spokesperson who talked to my health class.

I don't get it. Everyone said it would be safe, but now I've got AIDS. I thought if I put that little piece of latex on my penis before sex, then I'd be protected.

My principal says he's sympathetic and will see to it no one treats me any differently. Gee thanks, but what about my life? Can anybody give me back my life?

Larry: Oh, come on Bob! Don't be so glum. After all, you had a sexual experience, surely that makes it worthwhile? Just think of those other kids who actually wait until they are married adults before having sex. What a bore, right? At least this way you won't die a maladjusted and sexually repressive virgin. Ooh, that would be dreadful.

Well, thanks for your time, Bob. Let's move on to Melissa who looks a little pregnant; oops, I mean parasitically impaired.

Melissa: I am pregnant, Larry. I'm very pregnant.

Larry: Looks like you didn't take advantage of those free condoms young lady. You should know better by now.

Melissa: I did know better. My boyfriend wore a condom and still, look at me. I'm only 15, and now I have to make a decision between adoption, abortion or becoming a high-school mom. I can't go to "R" rated movies without my parents, and now I'm going to be a parent.

Larry: Quit being so cynical. Aren't there any happy condom freaks around here? This is supposed to be a hip story for a hip station for a hip generation. What's with these kids?

So, fantasy imitates life. Let's get real.

University should be catalyst for some anti-orthodox thinking

The following was composed from discussion involving an informal group from the University community and is in no way sanctioned by K-State. The group's main purpose is to raise ethical issues and concerns of interest to the University.

What about some intellectual surfing?

This essay is about surfing, but has nothing to do with water. While I am aware that ocean surfing is hardly an option for those of us ensconced in the rolling grasslands of the Midwest, we do have the opportunity to do some intellectual surfing — to ride the waves of wisdom.

The idea of intellectual surfing is important, because it touches on the essence of university life. Or, perhaps I should say, what I believe a university should be all about.

For me, coming from the Netherlands, traditionally a seafaring nation, such maritime metaphors are common. As a Dutchman, I am a foreigner here at K-State. Like others from "away," I cannot help but notice that rather remarkable homogeneity here on this beautiful campus.

Nicely tucked away in the Flint Hills, it feels like a sheltered place. Here, unlike elsewhere in much of the United States, one finds little evidence of this country as a multi-ethnic society.

This is probably why issues such as "multiculturalism," which is now quite literally a burning issue on many American campuses, is here mostly viewed as outlandish, perhaps quaint and easily dismissed as irrelevant. I find this shortsighted. But that's another matter.

Here, I am concerned with a less fashionable issue. Actually, I believe there is much more pernicious problem confronting the academic community. I call it the tyranny of orthodoxy.

In the final analysis, this is more of a threat to the well-being of the university as an institution than the attrition caused by more obvious factors such as slashed budgets, layoffs, salary freezes, tuition increases, library cutbacks or overcrowded classrooms.

From its foundations as an institution, the university has functioned as an intellectual center for the conservation, dissemination and advancement of higher learning. It has always been a place where orthodox, or customary, ideas and established doctrines have been challenged — a precious oasis in society where students were encouraged to explore the unknown. To master new skills. And perhaps most importantly, to think for themselves.

They are havens of originality and diversity, attracting free thinkers and, indeed, foreigners. Thus, universities occupy a somewhat precarious position within the conventions of wider society.

In this respect, K-State is not fundamentally different. Here, as elsewhere, most academic scholars have received their training as researchers and teachers at universities other than where they are currently employed. As a result, they often carry with them the ideas, patterns of thinking, research habits and teaching styles they picked up along their intellectual journeys.

At K-State, students take classes from professors from all over the world: Panama, India, Switzerland, Iran, Germany, Paraguay, France, China, England, Mexico and so on, including several scholars from my own corner of the world.

Of course, this diversity also exists, to a degree, among the students. While it is true that the vast majority of students call this prairie state their home, there are many from places as far as Japan, Ivory Coast, Spain and Argentina.

Often it is difficult to see if a professor or student is a foreigner. That is, until they begin to speak. Then suddenly, there is a different accent. Their language, while it is English, sounds unfamiliar and can be difficult to understand. After a while, though, one tends to get used to it, and it sounds less strange.

In a way, one could say the same thing about knowledge and ideas, which are the real stuff of university life. When first exposed to unfamiliar facts and theories, we may find them strange, alien or foreign. But we cannot reject them simply because we are unfamiliar with them.

Quite the contrary, students come to the university precisely because it is the place where one goes to learn a trade to capitalize on in the marketplace. In other words, as an institution made up of faculty and students, it should aspire beyond being a training center for future professionals.

No doubt, listening to the familiar is often easier, holding onto established customs more comfortable, and adhering to old beliefs more reassuring. But in our rapidly changing world, we are constantly looking at uncharted territories beyond yesterday's horizons.

The major function of the university is to create and preserve an intellectual climate in which people are encouraged to think for themselves, to challenge the usual beliefs and established doctrines.

Only then will it be possible for a society to effectively face the challenges of the future, to foster a generation eager to explore the new, and to enable students to successfully cope with the unexpected in our constantly changing universe.

Only then can students gain the perspectives needed to determine what from the past is worthy of being carried into the future.

This is why the university as a whole should promote diversity, reject orthodoxy, stimulate dialogue and emphasize creative thinking. As an institution (and therefore in a somewhat disciplined manner), it should not be afraid of a little chaos and anarchy — of waves.

And that brings us back to the ideal of intellectual surfing and the university's role in making the waves and showing us how to ride them gracefully and effectively. Without waves, there is no dynamic movement to carry us forward — only aimless floating on the surface.

Monstrous instruction

Godzilla, star of 13 major motion pictures and today's guest columnist, is currently a spokeslizard for Nike, Inc. but is considering an offer from the KC Royals as a broadcast analyst.

Yes, it's true. After all these years, I admit I have a soft spot for Big Eight football.

First, there's the conference. We've both been around for a long time. I also like things that are slow and lumbering, and most teams in the Big Eight are like that.

Since the K-State-Nebraska game is the only one left to play, everybody's attention is now squarely on you, Wildcats, especially here on Monster Island.

Since Tokyo has been a favorite stomping ground of mine for many years, this is how I see your impending battle with those Huskers.

I didn't just crawl out from under a rock yesterday. I know Nebraska's favored to bury you by a billion points.

But I've been buried before. In icebergs, under volcanoes — it wasn't a pretty sight. But nobody said I could beat Megalon, either. You have a real chance to beat everybody's expectations and make this a year to look back on.

So how to do it?

The most important thing to remember is it can be done — just ask Iowa State. The Cyclones turned four field goals, a great defensive game and one broken play for 80 yards into the upset of the year.

What does K-State need to do to win this game?

Sorry, Bill. I don't have any eligibility. Glen Mason did talk to me for a while, but like most KU recruits, I was disqualified for academic reasons.

But your brain doesn't need to be the size of a walnut to know that it's going to be settled by K-State's offense.

That quarterback Smargiasso sometimes reminds me of the tourists who go running every which way when I come down Main Street. Bud, you've got to tough it out once you're in the Tokyo Dome — hang back and trust that your line is going to protect you.

I'd be gun-shy, too, if I had to play behind a line that leaked like it did during the KU game. But running out of the pocket, scrambling for 30 yards around the field and ending up with a 2-yard gain is not going to cut it against Nebraska.

Neither will throwing the ball five times a game. The offense is going to have to be more multidimensional than that. You can't count on two blocked punts for easy points in this one.

Hang in there, Jason, risk the hit. Look for the open receiver. They're out there.

The offensive line has played a little better lately. We get ESPN on Monster Island, and I saw some of the good blocks the line made against Iowa State. I tell you, if I ever have to go up against Ghidrah again, I'm going to give Quentin Neujahr a call.

You're going to have to bring your kicking game with you, too. K-State may be the only football team on the planet where a touchdown is only worth six points.

Hit it between the uprights, not over. Don't leave Tokyo with your coach checking field-goal game footage all the way across the Pacific. He's probably getting sick of it.

Your defense is great and deserves all the credit it can get. Venables, Barta, Masters: You may not have been recognized by the Big Eight first-teamers, but you make my first-team all-

Wildcats to face Coppin State for 1st time

TONYA FOSTER
Collegian

In the second game of tonight's Wildcat basketball doubleheader, the men's squad opens its regular season against Coppin State of Baltimore at 7:30 in Bramlage Coliseum.

And although it is the first time the Wildcats have faced the Eagles, the team is not a complete stranger to K-State coach Dana Altman, who saw them play two exhibition games last week.

"They have two good scorers," Altman said. "They have NCAA tournament experience."

Coppin State has two starters returning from last season's 15-13 team. The Eagles finished fourth in the Mid-Eastern Athletic Conference with a 9-7 record.

The returning starters are 6-foot-6 junior forward Tariq Saunders and 6-2 sophomore guard Keith Carmichael.

Coach Ron Mitchell is 101-75 in his seventh season at Coppin State. The Eagles won both of their exhibition games.

"Mitchell does a good job," Altman said. "I've known him for a while."

Coming out of its own exhibition schedule, Altman said K-State has to be better on defense, especially on rebounding.

In the Cats' final exhibition game, they were out-rebounded 40-34 by the smaller Cuban national team.

Altman said the Wildcat offense is not where it should be. Against the Cubans, a team averaging more than 95 points a game in six exhibition games, the Cats scored just 36 points in the first half and 92 total.

The team did, however, shoot 52 percent from the floor.

Altman said he firmly believes the team performance reflects its practices.

"Last year, the team played like it practiced," Altman said. "Last year, when we had success, we did what we talked about."

Altman said getting off to a good start in December is crucial to set the tone for the season.

Probable starters for the Wildcats are senior forward Vincent Jackson, junior forward Deryl Cunningham, senior forward Aaron Collier, junior guard Askia Jones and community college transfer guard Anthony Beane.

Beane led the Cats in the two exhibition games against Fort Hood AAU and the Cubans with an average of 5.5 assists per game to earn the starting nod.

"It's tough for any first year player to learn," Altman said. "Anthony earned the spot. He never came to practice without giving physically."

Beane, who led Three Rivers Junior College to the 1992 community college national championship by hitting the game-winning 3-pointer, said he is hoping to bring some leadership to K-State.

"Because I'm a lot smaller, I feel I have to work twice as hard," said Beane, who, at 5-10, is the team's smallest player.

■ K-State starts the season today with a doubleheader at Bramlage Coliseum. The Lady Cats play Missouri-Rolla at 5 p.m. The Wildcats follow at 7:30 to face Coppin State.

Lady Cats start home stretch with Missouri-Rolla

BRIAN ANDERSON
Collegian

The regular season begins for the Lady Cats at 5 p.m. today at Bramlage Coliseum when K-State takes on Missouri-Rolla, a Division II school. It's the first game of a seven-game home stand.

K-State is coming off a 53-54 exhibition-game loss Nov. 22 to the Cassovia-Kosice-Czechoslovakia team. K-State coach Susan Yow said her team tried to improve its offensive play in practice, after turning the ball over 31 times in the loss.

"We worked on being efficient on offense," Yow said as the Lady Cats shot only 37 percent in their last game. "We've been trying to make our team have quick and better decisions."

"We have high hopes and high expectations," Yow said of the first game. "This is an exciting time for us."

Yow said Rolla is a hard-working team. "They haven't been beaten badly," Yow said. "They play hard and scrappy. This is a big game for them. This ought to be a real good game."

The Lady Miners coming to Manhattan with a 2-2 record. They collected victories over Quincy College and Missouri Western, while losing to Oklahoma City and Southern Illinois.

The starters for the Lady Cats against Rolla are Jo-Moree Grattan, Kelly Moylan, and forward Leah Honeycutt will lead the team. Newcomers Shanelle Stires and Stacy Neal will also open the 1992-1993 campaign.

Cloud County transfer Shanelle Stires was the top scorer for the Lady Cats with 13 points and a team-high of seven steals against the Czechs team.

Sophomore Joey Ward will be ready to step in. The forward came off the bench and contributed three assists.

"Joey had a nice game," Yow said. "She gave us 11 minutes of quality time. We look for her to be consistent throughout the season. This could make our team stronger. We are pleased with her effort."

Starting the season with seven games in front of the home crowd, Yow said she sees it as an advantage for her team.

BYRD HAS FRACTURE BUT MAY WALK AGAIN

NEW YORK (AP) — There is hope for 26-year-old Dennis Byrd.

The day after the New York Jets defensive lineman was carried off the field with a broken neck, his doctors would not rule out the possibility that he may walk again.

"We're looking at this with guarded optimism," Dr. Martin Cammins, a neurosurgeon, said Monday.

The 6-foot-5, 266-pound Byrd fractured his C-5 vertebra Sunday in a violent head-first collision with teammate Scott Mersereau. His legs and lower arms remain paralyzed.

Hershman and a team of neurosurgeons and other spinal experts at the hospital did point to some developments that suggest Byrd may recover.

Byrd has some feeling in his legs and demonstrated slight movement in his toes and fingers, the doctors said.

Byrd will have an operation on his neck on Wednesday, the hospital says.

Seattle stuns Denver in overtime, 16-13

ASSOCIATED PRESS

SEATTLE — John Kasay, whose extra point tied the game after regulation time expired, kicked a 33-yard field goal with 3:56 left in overtime to give the Seattle Seahawks an improbable 16-13 victory over the Denver Broncos on Monday night.

Seattle, 2-10, trailed 10-0 after one quarter and 13-3 well into the final quarter, but tied after Kasay kicked a 33-yard field goal with 5:20 left, and Stan Gelbaugh hit Brian Blades on the final play of regulation. Kasay's kick sent the game into overtime.

Kasay missed a 33-yard field goal 4:47 into the extra period, hooking the kick wide to the right. But he got a second chance after Gelbaugh drove the Seahawks from Denver's 38 to the 14, helped by a pair of penalties against the Broncos, including an illegal contact call that negated an interception.

After a timeout, Kasay left-footed the ball through the uprights to snap the Seahawks' eight-game losing streak.

Denver, 7-5, playing without starting quarterback John Elway for the second straight week, fell into a tie for second place in the AFC West with San Diego, one game behind Kansas City.

Before the late surge, it appeared the Broncos would coast to victory behind rookie Tommy Maddox's first NFL touchdown pass and two field goals by David Treadwell.

Maddox subbed for Elway for the second straight game. He gave the Broncos a quick lead with a 6-yard scoring pass to Mark Jackson 4:19 into the game and Treadwell added a 28-yard field goal just over five minutes later.

Denver made it 13-3 with 5:26 left in the third quarter on Treadwell's second field goal.

Manhattan will be getting a taste of straight rock 'n' roll today, a sound similar to the Replacements but inspired by the Beatles.

Guitarist Todd Newman, formerly of the Leatherwoods, will be performing an acoustic set at 7 tonight at Streetside Records. The band broke up after recording its debut album, "Topeka Oratorio."

Streetside employee Chris Ilcin said he heard Newman play in Lawrence and spread the word that Manhattan would be interested in hearing him play.

Newman agreed, and the Leatherwoods' producer, Twin/Tone Records, is paying for his performance.

"He is underrated. It is a great album," Ilcin said.

Newman is originally from Topeka and attended the University of Kansas. He then moved to Minnesota, where he got the break his band needed.

He met Peter Jespersen, co-founder of Twin/Tone Records, who the Replacements' manager in their early years and briefly a road

K-State's chapter of the American Society of Interior Designers is refurbishing the Manhattan Emergency Shelter.

ASID has chapters worldwide. The professional interest group is working nationally to change its image, said Mary Jane O'Connor, senior in interior design and campus chapter president.

She said the group is trying to get rid of the stigma associated with interior designers.

"This organization deals with more than just picking out wallpaper and curtains," O'Connor said.

"We make things functional. People don't realize what a big deal housing is now. We make it more affordable and more adaptable."

Since the group began the service project, members have put in 210 hours in four days, said Brenda Walden, ASID volunteer chairwoman.

"The project is going very well. It is taking a little bit longer than we expected, but we are pleased with the progress that we're making," Walden said.

"The emergency shelter is delighted we are doing this service project, they really needed the help," O'Connor said.

"We are refurbishing, stripping down layers of wallpaper, painting and sanding floors."

"We're not doing this for publicity," Walden said.

"This is a charity project. We're not just throwing colors together. I hope this shows the community that we are really helping."

O'Connor said she hopes the project will make people appreciative of what they have.

"The guests at the shelter deserve decent living conditions, and that's what we're trying to give them," she said.

Pregnancy options are covered

Kim Menard, licensed and mastered social worker for the Kansas Children's Service League, said she acts as a non-judgmental resource.

"I don't have a specific role. I stress to them continually that they are the ones in control and that all the responsibility is theirs," Menard said.

KCSL is a private, non-profit United Way agency. It provides all services free of charge. Menard said she has seen about 25 women with unplanned pregnancies this year, ranging in age from 12 to 22.

Menard said she sees three options from which to choose in dealing with an unplanned pregnancy — abortion, adoption and keeping the baby. However, making the decision is completely up to the individual, she said.

"There might not be three options for everyone, because everyone has a different angle," she said.

Wheeler said support is one of the most important things to help the woman during the decision-making process for an unplanned pregnancy.

"For most women, abortion is a difficult decision," Wheeler said. "Support is so important. The need for outside counseling depends on what other support she has."

Menard said some kind of outside intervention is important for the woman as support in her decision. She said many times younger women have more problems dealing with an unplanned pregnancy because they haven't experienced making many important decisions.

"It is a very important decision," Menard said. "A lot of people have not had the practice making big decisions, perhaps irreversible decisions. It can be overwhelming."

Wheeler said she begins by learning about the woman's circumstances and her religious background. She said her main concern is that the woman makes her own decision.

Menard said during the first session, she finds out what the woman thinks her options are.

"Usually there are two options for most people," Menard said. "I ask the woman what are the reasons they would consider this an option, and what are the reasons they would not consider this an option. Then I write down their reasons and read it back to them."

"A lot of times, they haven't thought of it like that. It's just a little clearer when it is in writing — their own thoughts and their own feelings."

Lafene offers a packet to pregnant women that outlines their options, Senock said. It gives the names, phone numbers and addresses of abortion clinics, adoption agencies and local physicians.

The advising process requires several visits to the counselor. Sometimes the pregnant woman will ask for group family counseling.

Menard said can handle private counseling with the woman or counseling with the whole family.

"We can meet with the whole group if that's what the mother wants," Menard said. "The goal would be to get them to talk openly together — they might not have done that yet. Most the time, each family member is worried about the other."

Unless it is a case of rape or incest, Wheeler said she encourages the woman to contact the father and tell him about the situation.

"I would probably encourage her to talk to him, unless she really wanted to disconnect," Wheeler said. "If she's on good terms with him, he probably would be a support and could help her make the decision. It really depends on their relationship."

Women who choose abortion, Menard said commonly have difficulty getting back into normal dating situations because of emotional effects.

"Follow-up counseling is important. Many people after, maybe, years later will need counseling and can't get it," Senock said.

Arts, sciences may cut 3 programs

request or a commitment to the Legislature," she said. "In some instances, colleges would close down lines and give those funds to pay for other programs or salaries."

This means that on a budget sheet, any positions listed as vacant would be eliminated. The money saved would be divided among faculty, Zivanovic said.

One proposed elimination is international studies and South Asian studies secondary majors, because of low enrollment, Zivanovic said. The college would still emphasize cultural diversity and international understanding, she said.

Also proposed is the discontinuation of the master's degree option in public administration, the speech pathology and audiology program and the athletic training emphasis in kinesiology.

Larry Noble, head of the kinesiology department, said if the proposal passes, the athletic training program would probably be picked up in another department.

He said 25 students are enrolled in the program, not including 15 freshman observers.

"Everyone currently in the program will complete the program and take the national qualifying exam," he said.

"With the freshmen, I'm not sure if the athletic trainers would work with kinesiology, but there would be an internship program offered. It would offer upper-division classes that trainers would need to know."

Ann Smit, speech pathology and audiology program director, said the program offered the administration two arguments against elimination.

"The graduate program is of high quality," she said. "When our students take the national exam, they always score high."

"The second point is we have the only program to be cut total line with an almost all-female faculty. Our faculty is 96-percent female, which doesn't go along with the Role and Aspirations of hiring women and minorities in the sciences."

Zivanovic said the Provost's Committee considered many aspects before making that decision.

"It's not contradictory (to hiring women and minorities)," she said.

"It's certainly a situation of concern. There were several other factors involved, but they felt they had to make that decision."

Court won't review Guam abortion law to review a major abortion dispute. But a new case, testing how far states may go in making abortions more difficult to obtain, already is before the justices and could be acted on as early as next week.

The court also is wrestling with whether federal judges have the authority to deal with abortion-clinic blockades.

"Today's action was hardly unexpected," said Burke Balch of the National Right to Life Committee, which opposes abortion. "It underlines the reaffirmation of Roe v. Wade."

David Andrews of Planned Parenthood said his group was relieved by the court's action. But he also said it does not address the problem of severe restrictions the court has let states impose on women seeking abortions.

ESSENTIALS

'Never Knew Lonely' has more questions about love

DEAR CASSANDRA,

I am writing you a second letter for three reasons.

First, the first letter I wrote was very sincere and from my heart. I chose to be anonymous, because as a guy, I fear what my "macho" friends might say.

So, the girl who wrote in about me has nothing to worry about, and as to where I have been all her life, I answer simply, "In the shadows of life."

The second reason I am writing is I met someone I like quite a lot, but there is a problem.

She is in a sorority, and, as you might have guessed, I am not in a fraternity. And it seems that almost all the greek women lose interest in a guy when they find out he is not greek. As a matter of fact, they become quite snobby.

I know how to let my feelings be shown, but when it comes to reading what the other sex is feeling, I am a dunce.

I have called her once and asked her out, but her sorority has so many functions, she has no time, but she wants me to call back.

Should I? I don't want it to seem like I am desperate, but at the same time, I don't want to let her slip by.

Never Knew Lonely 'Till Now, Part 2

DEAR LONELY,

Read this lady as "cool, but interested."

I would remain persistent a while longer, but if the response remains the same, write her off as a loss — her loss.

I think it is obvious that if you were at the top of her list, she would move Mount Everest (and a few sorority functions) to make a date.

"Desperation" is only in your mind, not hers. Persistence is your best bet. Good luck.

DEAR CASSANDRA,

I really enjoy your section, but there are times when I have no idea where you are getting your information.

How do you know so many answers, especially in the Nov. 16 section where you are calming a boy in distress who made a boo-boo.

Are you married as well and know from experience, or are you just blurring out drawn opinions?

Secondly, in regards to J.T.W., why in the hell did you say you would marry her the second time? Aren't you man enough to let your "no" be "no"? In my opinion, you are just digging a bigger hole.

Thirdly, the singles bit at the K-State Union was not all that bad. I commend anyone who went, although

I did not find anyone, but I am still looking.

Elmer Fudd Inc.

DEAR ELMER,

For technical questions, such as medical or health, I try to go to a reputable, professional source for credible background information.

The personal advice, however, as my column indicates, is my own. Some of my opinions come from direct experiences (I am married) and others simply from insight.

Everyone has answers, but you, the reader, are the best judge of whether my advice is on the mark.

The nice thing about a column such as this one is the anonymity — the fact that I do not know you and you do not know me.

It lends a certain amount of objectivity to my answers that would otherwise be difficult for you to acquire unless, of course, you went to a professional.

But that costs money, and most people's problems simply require someone willing to listen and provide a second opinion.

I do not claim to "know" all the answers, but, hopefully, I am rendering "good" advice more times than not. Only time will tell.

Letters to Cassandra may be submitted in person or by mail to the Kansas State Collegian, c/o Cassandra Duveaux, Kedzie Hall 106, Manhattan, KS 66506. Cassandra reserves the right to edit the content for the purpose of conserving space. Unless otherwise specified, all letters will be open to the public. Correspondence designated as "private" or "not for publication" will be maintained in the strictest confidence. "We also acknowledge unreservedly that everyone has the right not to be interviewed by the news media," he said.

"But we are concerned that this opinion will allow anyone to make repeated, groundless accusations against someone without being held accountable publicly.

In the Wichita case, a reporter was trying to verify the claim that the victim was not adequately protected while in a hospital.

"We are also concerned that law-enforcement agencies will have the ability to decide indiscriminately whether to name a victim or not name a victim," Hirschman said.

Stephan said state statute guarantees victims will have certain rights, including the right to be treated with "courtesy, compassion and with respect for their dignity and privacy."

"The importance of this statutory right was overwhelmingly emphasized in November of this year, when the electorate approved the constitutional amendment for victims' rights," Stephan said in the opinion.

The amendment to the Kansas constitution provides that "victims of crimes as defined by law, shall be entitled to certain basic rights."

He also cited a recent Kentucky Supreme Court ruling that a licensing agency's investigation file was exempt from disclosure under the Kentucky Open Records Law, on which Kansas' law is modeled.

In that case, the investigation file in question contained a client's complaints about alleged misconduct by a psychologist.

Nutcracker Auditions

For a holiday season you'll long remember, perform with the Tulsa Ballet Theatre! Thirty-seven children are needed to portray angels, mice, rabbits, clowns, soldiers, and bakers when TBT presents The Nutcracker in McCain Auditorium on Thursday and Friday December 3 and 4 at 7:30 p.m.

Girls 6-12 years old and boys 7-12 years old who have had at least two years of ballet or gymnastics training and who can be available for all rehearsals and performances are encouraged to apply.

Girls should wear tights, leotards, and ballet shoes - not toe shoes - to the audition. Boys should wear tee shirts with tights or shorts. Please come dressed for the audition.

All children should bring an index card with this information on it: Your name (printed), age, clothing size, leotard size, name of parent(s) or guardian(s), address, and phone number. All children should also bring a stamped, self-addressed envelope.

Auditions are Saturday, October 24, in McCain: 1:30 to 3 p.m. for children ages 6-9; 2:30 to 4:00 p.m. for children ages 10-12.

For more information, call the McCain Auditorium office at 532-6425, weekdays 9:00 a.m. to noon of 1:00 p.m. to 4:00 p.m.

Yeltsin makes it out of oust attempt

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MOSCOW — President Boris Yeltsin survived an impeachment attempt at the rowdy opening of Congress Tuesday, and then proposed a compromise to trim presidential powers but continue market reforms.

His proposal drew strong opposition, including from some supporters. Early votes indicated that neither Yeltsin's supporters nor opponents had the strength to force through their ideas, leaving them groping for middle ground that would avoid a stalemate.

Yeltsin urged lawmakers to resist the champions of "hard-line Bolshevism" who threaten to "divide the society, to set the executive and legislative branches against each other in a final clash, to weaken the state and breed chaos."

His proposal was aimed at generating new momentum for his economic reforms by preventing the Congress of People's Deputies, dominated by hard-liners elected before the collapse of the Soviet Union, from hobbling the more radical Cabinet.

Hard-liners want to slow the economic changes and drop acting Prime Minister Yegor Gaidar, the architect of the reforms.

In an hour-long speech in the Grand Kremlin Palace, Yeltsin accused lawmakers of putting "their own ambitions, careers, demagoguery and cheap political effects above the truth, the interests of the people and the state."

His proposal hit a snag as the words left his mouth. Deputies laughed derisively when Yeltsin said he would stop seeking an Education cuts will not cost jobs, dean says

TONYA FOSTER
Collegian

EDITOR'S NOTE: The Kansas Board of Regents has called for new Role and Aspirations Statements from each state university. This is the ninth story in a series on what K-State's colleges are doing to fulfill this mandate.

The College of Education may place emphasis on particular items, but the college's dean said that does not mean money will be spent.

Dean Michael Holen said the proposed elimination and discontinuation of certain programs will not cost professors their jobs. The professors of discontinued programs would be used in the programs to be emphasized, he said.

"We would take faculty members to emphasize elementary education, for example," Holen said.

He said the elimination of the Department of Computer Education and Educational Technology could provide computer technology for secondary education students.

"We are going to transfer technology programs to secondary education," Holen said. Amy Smith, sophomore in secondary education, said she thinks emphasizing programs will benefit the college.

"I feel the program emphasis will see more resources from within the college," she said.

Holen said the college is working to get more grants and contracts to support training centers for science education, rural and small schools, and extended services.

He said there are several places where money can be obtained.

"By eliminating department heads, the college won't have to pay salaries," Holen

Engineering Tech to close in 1994

K-State-Salina to absorb required courses

DIANE DENISON
Collegian

The Department of Engineering Technology will close in May 1994.

The College of Technology at K-State-Salina then will offer all the required courses.

The College of Engineering currently offers junior and senior courses for mechanical engineering technology and electrical engineering technology. These courses are gradually being moved to the Salina campus.

"Most of our courses are being taught only once a year," said John Ulrich, engineering technology department head. "With the program being closed here, more and more program courses will be closed every semester."

After this semester, 10 courses will be closed with six more to be closed after the spring semester, he said. None of these courses are being offered in Salina, but they will be offered next fall.

Many students have expressed their disapproval of the department closing.

"My classes are made of about 80 percent of the same people in each one," said John Migliazzo, junior in engineering technology.

Some of the students say they think they are being rushed, said Barry Voorhees,

► CAUSE OF CRASH NOT YET KNOWN

HARLEM, Mont. (AP) — Weather and mechanical problems aren't suspected in the collision of two military cargo jets, apparently killing all 13 aboard, authorities said Tuesday.

Nine bodies had been found by mid-afternoon Tuesday.

The planes crashed late Monday while on a training mission.

In another Air Force crash Monday night, a B-1B strategic bomber went down and exploded in western Texas during a training flight. The fate of the four crewmen was unknown.

► LOUISIANA ASKS FOR REVIEW OF ABORTION LAW

BATON ROUGE, La. (AP) — Louisiana said Tuesday it will ask the U.S. Supreme Court to review the state's strict anti-abortion law, despite the court's rejection of a similar law in Guam.

Attorney General Richard Ivey said the prospects for approval were slim, but said he had a legal obligation to defend Louisiana's laws.

Louisiana's law, declared unconstitutional in September by a federal appeals court, would have allowed abortions only to save the life of the mother and, with tight restrictions, when pregnancy results from rape or incest. It would send doctors who violate the law to prison for 10 years.

SOMALIA

U.N. leans toward use of military force

U.S. could lead coalition if plan OK'd Thursday

ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS — The Security Council on Tuesday moved toward approval of a U.S. plan to lead a military intervention force in Somalia to provide humanitarian aid to the starving population.

Some developing nations had expressed misgivings about a possible large-scale U.S. intervention, but their fears were expected to be overcome by assurances of a U.N. role in the operation.

The United States planned to circulate its plan among all 15 council members today, and diplomats are aiming for adoption Thursday.

Sir David Hannay, Britain's ambassador, reported after the council's closed-door meeting, in which an outline of the U.S. proposal was discussed, that a consensus was building in favor of a U.S.-led force.

"There was broad agreement in the council by most delegations on the fourth option of the secretary-general which clearly envisages a U.S. general in command," Hannay told reporters after the Tuesday night meeting.

Western diplomats who saw the U.S. proposal said it calls for the 15-member council to invite the United States to name a commander for the operation.

Like the resolution authorizing military action in the Persian Gulf War, they said, the resolution says the operation may employ "all measures necessary" — meaning force, said the diplomats, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The Persian Gulf operation was authorized by the Security Council but carried out by a U.S.-led coalition. There was no U.N. commander.

"We'll work with the U.N. no matter what they come up with on it," spokesman Pete Williams said.

Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali recommended Monday that the council authorize a military operation to stop looting by bandits and clan warlords of food intended for starving Somalis.

ON THE AGENDA

Semi-annual celebration busts a move

JILL SCHRAG
Collegian

K-State's semi-annual celebration of modern dance returns with a change of venue and a professional twist.

K-State's dance department will move WinterDance '92 from its traditional setting in McCain Auditorium to Nichols Theatre this year. Part of the reason for the move is scheduling conflicts with "The Nutcracker," which will be in McCain.

This is only the second time since 1978 the production has been moved.

Luke Kahlich, professor of dance and theater, said performing in Nichols is very different from McCain, because the audience is on three sides instead of one.

"You have to keep asking yourself while you're choreographing, 'Is this side of the audience seeing butts all the time?'" he said.

Kahlich described the stage in Nichols as an experimental space and a major challenge. It is less than half the size of the McCain stage.

Deborah Riley, this year's guest artist, said she had to rearrange her choreography for the stage.

Riley teaches modern dance to 250 students at Dance Place, a studio/theater in Washington, D.C.

MODERN DANCE

■ WinterDance '92 will be at 8 p.m. Thursday, Friday and Saturday, and at 2 p.m. Friday in Nichols Theatre.

She is completing a two-and-a-half week residency at K-State. She will teach class and choreograph and perform for WinterDance.

Most of the dances performed in this year's program are modern, Kahlich said.

He said WinterDance is a chance for about 25 students to perform on stage and to share what they do with the community.

"After all, why should we train if we never do it?" he said.

Several students will get a chance to put dances they have choreographed on stage. Kahlich described the dances as abstract patterns and pure movement. He said they will address women's issues, cultural myths about men and women, and AIDS.

"About the only thing you won't see is classical ballet," he said. "We're the alternative dance concert, I guess."

KSU alumnus up for House post

BY THE COLLEGIAN STAFF

A K-State alumnus has thrown his hat in the ring for the position of Kansas House minority leader.

Rep. George Teagarden, D-LaCygne in the 5th District and 1966 K-State graduate, is challenging Tom Sawyer of Wichita.

Teagarden, a farmer-stockman from the Linn County town — about 60 miles south of Kansas City — said he is hopeful about his chances.

"I am being considered, and it seems to be going pretty well," he said. "I've been in the Legislature for the last 12 years. So, I know my way around."

He has been on the House Appropriations Committee for 10 years, serving as chairman for the past two. His opponent had served as House Majority Leader until the Republicans gained control of the House in the Nov. 3 election.

Teagarden said he thinks he has the experience to keep the communication open between the two parties.

"The reason I'm trying for this position is that I have the ability to keep the Democratic party together as a unit," he said. "I represent a kind of mainstream, Kansas people, and I think I will do well dealing with the majority party."

He said he doesn't want to make many changes in the legislative agenda.

"I'd like to see us maintain some of the programs put into place over the past few years," Teagarden said. "And we could expand on some as well."

Meats team takes title

K-State judging team beats out 16 to take national crown

BILL SPIEGEL

Collegian

The K-State Meats Judging Team captured the national title Nov. 22 in Dakota City, Neb.

Sixteen teams from various regions competed in the national contest at the IBP meat packing headquarters, said the team's coach John Unruh, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry.

Team members competed in a variety of classes, Unruh said. Yield and quality grading of beef carcasses is one event in which members see how close to an official's results they could get.

Unruh said the official judges used mechanical devices to determine the quality of the carcass, while the students had to determine the results on their own.

Students also had to rank and place four exhibits consisting of beef, lamb and pork carcasses, and ham and beef cuts, he said.

Team members had to judge nine classes of rankings, giving five sets of reasons as to why they placed the classes the way they did, Unruh said.

Adam Weigand, junior in agribusiness, said this part was the most difficult of the competition.

"This contest, they had a couple of very hard placings," he said.

Weigand placed first overall, and Brian Bell, senior in animal sciences and industry placed second overall in the contest. Leslie Hedstrom, junior in animal sciences and industry placed sixth, and Jaci Dorran, junior in animal sciences and industry, placed ninth.

Unruh said the team practiced extensively all semester.

"During the fall season, we spend probably a minimum of 16 to 18 hours a week practicing. So, it is a considerable time commitment. Some weeks before contest we put in over 30 hours."

Bell said the practice paid off.

"I was very surprised, very happy," he said. "It gave me a feeling I've never felt before. I'm number one in the nation, and nobody can take it away."

The meats judging team will be honored at a banquet Dec. 14 with K-State President Jon Wefald.

IN OUR OPINION

By the Collegian Editorial Board

Terminally ill also have rights

THE ISSUE

Many terminally ill patients die in loneliness due to society's rule of keeping everyone alive, despite their pain.

WE SUGGEST

Let people decide their own fates if they are capable of doing so.

A large and unknown number of terminally ill patients in America die by doctor-assisted suicide.

Yet those who "choose to take their lives," says an article in the New England Journal of Medicine, "often die alone so as not to place their families or care givers in legal jeopardy."

This is a sad reflection on society's present resistance to letting people legally chose their own fate. The resistance against assisted death has forced many near death to pass on alone, with nary a friend or family member close to ease their loneliness.

The Journal of Medicine article now urges that a new policy be formulated for this dilemma, listing several guidelines for doctors to follow.

These include that the patient's condition must be "incurable and associated with severe unrelenting suffering." The patient must not have "to 'beg' for assistance," yet must "clearly and repeatedly" ask to die to avoid further suffering.

Also, the doctor must be sure the patient's judgment is not distorted due to depression or some other treatable ailment. The patient's doctor, barring any moral compunction, should be the assisting doctor.

With this, the assisting doctor should get a second opinion, and all three — doctors and patient — should sign an informed consent document.

The guidelines are not intended as the final word. They merely tighten the focus on an issue wrought with moral and legal problems. It's time for society to ease the pain of its terminal citizens. The Journal of Medicine article is a step in the right direction.

BIRTH CONTROL

Condoms help much more than they hurt

Editor,

Mr. Spradlin, your sarcastic approach in your column about condom distribution disgusts me. You have belittled two important problems that our society faces and made the whole issue into a damn joke.

You were correct, though, in stating that risk of pregnancy and AIDS is not eliminated by the use of condoms. No one can deny that. However, the risk is greatly reduced. And you, sir, cannot deny that.

Also, I wish you would realize, regardless of your values, that teens are going to have sex before marriage. Knowing this, why is it so terrible to inform them about condoms when they are in a place of education, namely high school?

This brings me to my biggest problems with your beliefs and values. Your opposition to abortion is obvious due to the content of your previous articles. Why then do you believe that the people who are getting abortions should not have easy access to something as simple as a condom? This seems to be a huge flaw in your thinking.

I have one final question for you. Have you ever heard the phrase, "If you are not part of the solution, you are part of the problem?"

Robert Hackney
Freshman/Psychology

MORE BIRTH CONTROL

The missing part of condom interview

Editor,

I noticed at least one interview missing in Scott Spradlin's Dec. 1 condom interviews. Here's how it went:

Larry: "Well, how about we talk to John, this guy over here. What's your story?"

John: "Well, I met a woman a while ago and we have been dating for a couple of weeks. We had finally determined that we were going to have sex. Because of the health class where students were told about condoms and everyone was given one, I decided to use it. I still would have had sex without it, but I figured that this was safer."

"A few days after we had sex, my girlfriend found out that she had gotten AIDS from her last boyfriend. She didn't make him wear a condom. Luckily, I didn't get it. Using a condom is the only thing that kept me from contracting AIDS. I feel worse, though, for my girlfriend, who will probably be shunned by society until she dies of an AIDS-related illness."

Come on, Mr. Spradlin, let's do get real. Do you really believe people who have already decided to wait until they're married will jump at the chance to have sex when they get hold of a piece of latex? Access to condoms isn't going to change their minds.

On the other hand, there are the people who have sex without using a condom. They could be using other birth control devices or nothing at all. In either case, if they were to be successfully encouraged to use a condom, they would significantly lower the chances of an unwanted pregnancy or of contracting a sexually transmitted disease.

STUDENT SENATE

Rep speaks out on what Senate does

Editor,

I am writing in response to a letter to the editor in the Nov. 24 Collegian. I am the senator the letter was directed to.

First, I would like to applaud the student who wrote the letter. In today's society, people often don't question the system. They stand idly by as changes take place around them. I would like to answer her questions. Then I will explain the quote that generated the letter in the first place.

What we do in Student Senate is vital to the University. We allocate funds, pass bills and resolutions that change, hopefully for the betterment of the students, the way this campus deals with certain issues. Why do they need us to do it was the second question. That is simple. So that your, or rather our, voices can be heard. We are there to make sure the students are not overlooked. Please remember that I am a student as well.

Yes, it is our job to keep students informed. I welcome any student to ask me any questions on any legislation, and I challenge any student to ask questions on what is going on.

The quote was taken completely out of context. If the reporter would have been at the meeting, she would not have used that paraphrased quote in the text. Anyone at the meeting heard me debate that I had talked to many students about the fee raise. But many students simply don't care about the fine print or the politics of this campus. I am trying to do my part to get involved on this campus. Why don't you do yours? Bravo, Angela Lambley, for taking a stand.

HARASSMENT

Major issue prevalent even here at K-State

Editor,

At this time, with the election just ending, we are focusing more on national issues. But I feel that we need to focus on a very important issue here at K-State. This is not an issue that many faculty or students discuss, but it is a problem. I'm talking about sexual harassment occurring student to student and faculty to student.

Many students and faculty need to sit back and think about comments that are made toward each other.

No one is willing to discuss this issue because they are afraid of what will happen to them or the people involved.

I have personally seen and heard of faculty members and students being harassed. So why not do something about it? "Because it's a long process and nothing will get resolved," quoted by an anonymous student.

I think that many faculty and students are not aware of the Kansas State University Prohibiting Sexual Harassment Policy. A copy is available in the Student Government Association office. So, let's go a step further. I think it would benefit everyone if the Collegian would print the policy on sexual harassment, to let readers know what actions to take when being harassed.

More and more in the United States, sexual harassment charges are being brought out, like the Anita Hill and Clarence Thomas case.

So, I want to encourage faculty and students to report any type of sexual harassment actions to the dean in the college in which it occurred.

Protect yourself and other students, so that it doesn't happen to someone else.

STANDARDS

Media seems to have taste for lots of gore

Editor,

After going to school here for four years now, I still can't figure out this newspaper. From one-sided political issues denoting liberalist views of those who see to the print, to putting their noses in other people's affairs. The moron attitudes of the overseer's has once again shown through.

For two days in a row I have had the great pleasure of picking up the paper only to see, splattered across the front page, the agony and distress of some unfortunate soul. The Nov. 18 Collegian doubled the effect by putting the same type of photo of an unrelated accident inside as well.

Time and time again, the Collegian has printed photos of this nature with absolutely no regard to the victim or the victim's family and friends. In the first paper of the fall 1990 school year was a picture showing an accident victim being flown away by Life Flight, his arm hanging out of the helicopter, while paramedics struggled to save his life. The article went on to mention that the result was a D.O.A.

Are we as a society so deranged that we thrive to see the misery of others to support our own pathetic mentalities? Or does the paper take it upon their own accord to think that we do?

One thing the media doesn't think about is sure, maybe some low-life may desire to see the blood and suffering of others, but how about the victim and his or her family and friends? Once they see this thoughtless display of your demented greed, they all practically live through the incident again.

Martina Navratilova once said, "In Czechoslovakia there is no such thing as freedom of the press. In the U.S. there is no such thing as freedom from the press." The media manipulates practically every issue we as a culture face today. Politics. Sex and racism. Death and destruction. It's your job to spread the news; however, you do not have the moral right to disregard respect and values.

Is it dementia or stupidity? Think about all of those affected and realize that the effect on those involved is much worse than the satisfaction you obviously feel others may get.

The wonder of Christmas has since worn off

In a flurry of covert action, I scrambled through my parents' closet. Adrenaline rushed through my veins like whisky does in the South. The thrill of foiling a surprise. Could I, the youngest of the clan, outsmart the older and so-called wiser of the pack?

Jackpot!

There they were. Oodles of excitement and surprise tucked beneath stacks of bedding linens and old go-go boots.

Glimmering in the warm glow of late afternoon sunlight was a whole hoard of shiny packages with big bright bows and lots of ribbons.

You know, the ones you have to run across a sharp blade for them to curl up.

God, those were great.

Had to be quick. Never could tell when my parents would suddenly reappear, totting a bag full of questions that would impress even J. Edgar Hoover.

These wouldn't be of the standard name, rank and Social Security number variety. No, these questions would be loaded down with implications, and the Fifth Amendment just wouldn't fly. We may live in a democracy, but that all changes inside the walls of our homes.

Christmas was more than gifts and egg nog. It was excitement and surprise. My parents would try and hide the gifts. I would try and find them.

Even if I hadn't found the gifts, I could at least make my parents pay for their success. For you see, I was installed with one of those internal alarm clocks. Hours after my parents had gone to bed in the midst of a post-assembly high, I would wake up in a flurry of activity. They had conquered the new jungle-gym, tricycle, or whatever the hot purchase of the year was, but I was determined to get an early jump on the days festivities.

Oh, these were the days of Christmas past.

Today, I know Santa is a mere marketing myth. Presents are no longer gifts of love from a fat guy in a red velvet jumpsuit but rather a product of consumer bulimia. Buying in excess before the holiday. Then the day after Christmas, returning gifts in mass quantity. Binge and purge.

I miss the feelings of Christmas I had as a child. My parents would go to the ends of the Earth to keep us in the dark. To give us the best gift of all — surprise.

All my energy was channeled in an oftentimes futile attempt at spoiling their need to surprise. I matched their every move. I was getting pretty good at it, too.

"What do you want for Christmas this year?" my mom would ask in a nonchalant manner, giving only the vaguest indication she was actually listening. Didn't want to give away what she already had in mind. Leave me in the dark.

This was supposed to be my year to conquer. But, no! Now everything has changed.

When I was home for Thanksgiving, the subtle prodding gave way to a J. Crew catalog being flipped across the kitchen table as my mom's commands rang out. "Write down what you want so I can order it in time for it to be here by Christmas. Oh, and put some alternatives, just in case they are out."

What is this? Not only do I know what I am getting, I actually have a say in the matter. Something about this just doesn't sit right with me. Why am I — the only non-practicing Catholic in the family — the only one being nostalgic about this anti-climatic of holidays?

I used to love Christmas morning, blitzkrieging through the living room in my flannel PJs with the feet attached. In a flurry of static electricity, my packages would blast open. One after the other. Paper everywhere. Hell, I would even wear those damn bows on my head sometimes. Surprises on top of surprises.

Today I pick my gifts from mail-order catalogs or store windows. Pointing or nodding at whatever I think would look good with my name on it lying under the tree. Not a lot of surprise there. At one time, this would have been my own Holy Grail. Now, I lament the reality of knowing what lies inside those gleaming packages of the season.

Of course, there is always the possibility that this is just part of my parents' attempt at lulling me into a passivity. Maybe they really have no intention of going through with the gifts I picked out. Maybe there is a surprise here.

Grant given for textile research projects

DAN GRAFEL

Collegian

The College of Human Ecology is receiving gifts before the holiday season this year.

Two professors in the clothing, textiles and interior design department are the recipients of a $57,419 grant for textile research.

The research includes undergraduate textile majors who will work with high-school students during the summer program.

"The grant will be used toward increased opportunity for high-school students, as well as giving our own students some hands-on research direction," grant recipient Deanna Munson said.

Munson, assistant professor in clothing textiles and interior design, said she would assume the role of extension specialist by working with high schools and 4-H clubs to identify qualified youth.

Some examples of the types of research projects include non-food uses of soybean derivatives, environmental compatibility of textile products and the lightfastness of dyes, she said.

Each research team will consist of one undergraduate project supervisor and two high-school students.

"We will use this as career education for high-school students. It will introduce them to the high paying, challenging career opportunities in textile manufacturing and research," said Barbara Reagan, professor in clothing textiles and interior design and grant recipient.

"It will give the undergraduate project coordinators an opportunity to supervise research teams, and this team approach is important in business," she said.

Munson said part of the grant money will provide a $1000 stipend for the five or six high-school students who are chosen for the project.

She said she hoped the project would give highly qualified, science based students a chance to become involved in a university-level research project and stimulate interest in the college.

"Sometimes, the very gifted and bright that are looking for educationally challenging opportunities during the summer months seek them out in other states or other locales. Perhaps this will help provide more of that sort of thing in Kansas," Munson said.

Events mark World AIDS Day

About 1 million Americans are infected with HIV. The majority are ages 25-44. There are 242,146 U.S. AIDS patients.

Companies, TV stations help promote awareness.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ATLANTA — The United States must enlist businesses to defeat AIDS and reject bureaucratic solutions such as an AIDS czar, the secretary of Health and Human Services said Tuesday.

Louis Sullivan marked World AIDS Day by launching a new program to help companies keep HIV-positive employees working as long as possible.

Elsewhere, vandals painted an AIDS message on the state Capitol in Denver, museums removed paintings to remember stricken artists, and flags flew at half staff along Fifth Avenue in New York City.

Thirty-five cable TV companies planned to go off the air for a minute Tuesday night to emphasize the loss caused by AIDS deaths in the industry.

Sullivan said such efforts increase AIDS awareness in ways a national AIDS official couldn't.

He called on Congress and Clinton to adopt laws prohibiting companies from revoking AIDS patients' insurance, which the U.S. Supreme Court has said is legal.

Clinton urged the world to work together in fighting AIDS.

"For too long, America and the world have faced this epidemic divided and frightened," he said from Little Rock, Ark. "Today we must all pledge to work together on the research and prevention programs that will make the AIDS epidemic a part of our past."

Sullivan and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention launched a program to help corporate America establish workplace AIDS policies, train supervisors to deal with infected employees, educate employees and their families, and encourage community service.

About 50 people gathered at the United Nations in New York to protest the World Health Organization's theme for the day, "community commitment." They demanded the creation of a global public health-keeping force instead of concentrating on community responses to AIDS.

The mother of Ryan White, the Indiana schoolboy who became a national symbol of discrimination against AIDS victims, appealed for greater understanding of the disease.

"I think people are not wanting to listen until it affects them," Jeanne White-Ginder said in Philadelphia. "If you wait until it affects or infects a sibling, a loved one, a family member, then we've waited too long to get involved."

Her son, who contracted AIDS from his treatment for hemophilia, was banned from public school in the family's hometown of Kokomo, Ind. They moved to Cicero, Ind., where he lived until his death in 1990 of complications from AIDS at age 18.

In Denver, vandals painted "500,000 deaths. How many more?" on the steps of the Capitol. Across the street, a sack resembling a condom was placed near the figure of the Virgin Mary in a nativity scene.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Cats pull off doubleheader sweep

Men shoot 57.9 percent in victory against Coppin State

STEVE ROCK
Collegian

The men's basketball team completed the doubleheader sweep in the season opener for both Wildcat squads by beating the Coppin State Eagles 85-61 Tuesday night at Bramlage Coliseum.

Just hours after the Lady Cats defeated the Missouri-Rolla Lady Miners, the men's team won its ninth straight season opener and its third straight home opener.

And the Cats, who shot just 43 percent from the field last season, connected on 33 of their 57 shots, good for a 57.9 percent clip. It was their best performance since last season's opener against Texas-San Antonio, when K-State shot 58.9 percent.

The Cats also picked apart Coppin State's zone defense, drilling 11 of their 17 three-pointers, good for a higher percentage than they hit at any time last year — 64.7.

"We shot the ball decent today," Wildcat coach Dana Altman said. "We'll take 11 out of 17 three pointers any night out."

Sophomore guard Brian Henson, who broke his brother's freshman record with 42 three-pointers a year ago, made five of his eight shots from beyond the arc and led the Cats with 18 points.

"Anytime I see a zone, I look for the three-pointer," he said. "But I never expected them to play zone the whole game."

"We played really hard for 40 minutes today," he said. "We could have opened the lead a little more if we would have poured it on down the stretch, but it was nice to have a cushion."

Guard Askia Jones had 12 points for the Cats, and his seven assists was tops on the team. He also tied for the team lead with three steals and is now in tenth place on K-State's career steals list with 52.

Anthony Beane and Deryl Cunningham each scored 11 points.

Cunningham, who also led the team with 10 rebounds, recorded his second career double-double.

"Deryl got on the boards tonight," Altman said. "That's the type of effort I like to see."

Overall, K-State outrebounded the Eagles 37-28 and caused Coppin State to commit 22 turnovers.

How good did the Cats' season opener go?

Freshman guard Brian Gavin, who played just six minutes the entire game, threw up a last-second shot from well beyond the three-point arc as the game ended.

Swish.

But the Wildcats' season opener wasn't perfect — the Cats turned the ball over 23 times.

"We didn't handle the ball as well as we would have liked," Altman said. "Those 23 turnovers bother me because it's something that's very careless."

"We got real sloppy and let them come back when the game should have been over."

Beane, the team's primary point guard, had eight of those turnovers, and Altman said that eight turnovers is not going to be tolerated in the future.

"I came out a little nervous and a little excited and overanxious," Beane said. "But I have to make sure that doesn't happen again."

And Eagle coach Ron Mitchell said that the Wildcats can't improve until Beane improves.

"The key is their point guard," he said. "Their point guard has to take care of the ball better than he did."

"If he shows the leadership that he's capable of, this team can be very competitive."

The victory gives the Wildcats a 21-0 Bramlage Coliseum record against non-conference opponents when K-State scores more than 80 points.

Defensively, the Cats held the Eagles to a 39.3 shooting percentage, including a 5-for-15 shooting performance from Coppin State's main threat, junior Tariq Saunders. Eagle forward Stephen Stewart led all scorers with 25 points.

"I feel much better about this year's team than last year's team," Henson said. "There is chemistry, and we're working harder."

"I feel really good right now. This is a good start, and this team is headed in the right direction."

CRAIG HACKER/Collegian

Brian Henson, Wildcat guard, gets a hand on the ball as Coppin State guard Melvin Roberts tries to get around him Tuesday night at Bramlage Coliseum. Henson led the Cats in K-State's 85-61 win with 18 points.

"We'll take 11 out of 17 three pointers any night out."

Lady Cats topple Lady Miners, 70-59

CRAIG HACKER/Collegian

Kelly Moylan, Lady Cat guard, tries to get away from Missouri-Rolla guard Chris Bohannon during K-State's 70-59 win Tuesday at Bramlage Coliseum.

Victory for Yow is K-State's 1st since January of last year

BRIAN ANDERSON
Collegian

The Lady Cats opened their season Tuesday at Bramlage Coliseum, beating Division-II Missouri-Rolla 70-59.

It marked the first win since beating Iowa State Jan. 25 of last season and was the first non-conference win since Jan. 11 when the Lady Cats beat Loyola-Chicago.

"I'm happy to win," Coach Susan Yow said. "It has been a long time. We came through in the clutch."

The loss dropped the Lady Miners to 2-3 this season. Yow said Rolla played a great game against her squad.

"They are a well-coached team," she said. "They had the opportunity to knock us off. I'm pleased we came back."

The teams traded the lead five times before the Lady Cats went on a 9-2 run to take a 35-28 lead at halftime.

The Lady Miners got within one point of tying the game at the 9:23 mark of the second half.

K-State senior Leah Honeycutt, the leading scorer of the game with 19 points, made two straight baskets to give her team a 50-45 lead.

"Leah came on strong at the end," Yow said.

The Lady Cats stretched the lead to nine points before Kelly Moylan made a 3-pointer with about 30 seconds left on the clock.

"It was an important shot," Moylan said, who finished the game with 17 points and a team-high nine rebounds. "The coaching staff had a sigh of relief after the shot."

Moylan stepped up as scorer in the first half since Honeycutt was in trouble with three personal fouls. Moylan finished the half hitting five of eight field goals for 12 points.

"It feels good when it falls," Moylan said. "In the first half, the shots were falling. It was there, and it was open."

Andrea O'Neal, coming from the bench, scored 12 points and starter Shanelle Stires put in 11 points giving K-State four players in double digits.

"Stires hustled for us," Yow said. "Andrea opened things up. They did a lot of little things to change the game."

SPORTS DIGEST

► KU BEATS GEORGIA

LAWRENCE (AP) — The Kansas Jayhawks won their season opener Tuesday night 76-65 against Georgia in what Coach Roy Williams called the Hawks worst season opener. The No. 3 Jayhawks scored only 26 second-half points and shot just 29.7 percent.

Richard Scott led Kansas with 18 points and hit a follow shot to end a seven-minute second-half scoring drought.

Darrin Hancock had 14 points and eight rebounds in his regular season Kansas debut.

► BASEBALL UPDATES

(AP) — Tuesday was a busy day in major league baseball.

Roger Craig was fired as manager of the San Francisco Giants after guiding the Giants to a 807-804 record since Sept. 18, 1985. Coach Dusty Baker is the front-runner to replace him.

Pitcher Jose Guzman and the Chicago Cubs agreed on a $14.35 million, four-year contract. Guzman was 16-11 for the Texas Rangers last season with a 3.66 ERA in 33 starts.

Pitcher Doug Drabek, the 1990 Cy Young Award winner, signed with the Houston Astros for $20 million over four years. Drabek, 30, has won at least 14 games in each of the past five seasons.

And free agent infielder Scott Fletcher agreed today to a two-year, $1.2 million contract with the Boston Red Sox. Fletcher batted .275 with 51 RBI last year and had just four errors in 106 games.

College loan firm offers paybacks

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The nation's largest provider of college student loans unveiled a program Monday that will reduce interest payments for certain borrowers who pay their monthly installments on time.

The program, called Great Rewards, "is a whole new concept in education lending. ... it rewards good repayment habits," said Lydia Marshall, senior vice president of the Student Loan Marketing Association.

The association, known as Sallie Mae, can avoid costly collection procedures, such as overdue notices and telephone calls. The savings will be passed back to the "good" borrowers.

Sallie Mae is a publicly held, federally chartered financial services corporation that buys education loans from banks and other lending institutions. It owns more than $20 billion in federally insured student loans.

Under the program, 2 percent points would be shaved from the interest rate on a borrower's loan if payments are made on time for the first 48 months. The program is limited to Stafford loans, the most common type of student loan.

A typical borrower with $5,000 in Stafford loans would save $246 over the life of the loan, which is usually 10 years.

The first group of students who would benefit from the new program typically have loans with an interest rate of 8 percent in the first four years and 10 percent thereafter, Marshall said.

Under the program, one-time payments for the first four years would cut the interest rate for the following years by 2 percentage points, to 8 percent, she said.

The program will be available to students who get Stafford loans after Jan. 1, 1993, that are subsequently sold to Sallie Mae and serviced at one of its loan servicing centers.

Also eligible will be borrowers whose loans are owned and serviced by Sallie Mae, and who begin repaying on or after July 1, 1993.

Tulsa Ballet Theatre to perform

SHEDERA BAUSCH
Collegian

The Tulsa Ballet Theatre will perform "The Nutcracker" at 7:30 p.m. Thursday and Friday in McCain Auditorium.

"Most people have seen it once or twice. Now, they will want to take their children to see the production because they had a good experience with it," Richard Martin, director of McCain, said.

Martin said ticket sales increased after the Thanksgiving holiday, and the Friday night show is nearly sold out.

"This is one of the better companies touring this kind of production," Martin said. "The traditional choreography is still contained in the production."

Martin said both artistic directors, Moselyne Larkin and Roman Jasinski, come from that tradition of leaving the choreography as authentic as possible.

Jasinski, who has been the artistic director of the ballet theatre for almost two years, said he has made several visual changes, mostly with the scenery, costumes and lighting.

"We did fine-tune some of the choreography," Jasinski said.

The ballet will also incorporate 30 local children to play the parts of the mice, toy soldiers, rabbits, angels, bakers and baby clowns. These children, who auditioned in late October, were encouraged to have at least two years of ballet, tap, jazz or gymnastic experience.

"We want the children to be aware of their bodies," Jasinski said.

Susan Hannah, public relations director of the Tulsa Ballet Theatre, said the children get a taste of what it is like to be in a theater production.

"They get to rehearse with the ballet and gain some experience as to what it is like working with the company," Hannah said.

Jasinski said the children are split into groups according to what part they play. Then, they are taught the routine and are brought together for a full rehearsal.

"We have a lot of fun working with the children and meeting their families," Jasinski said.

Jasinski said it is a pleasure for his company perform "The Nutcracker," especially for the audience's reaction.

"Smiles, giggles, laughter and fun — the audience is always excited about the show," Jasinski said.

The Tulsa Ballet Company is much like a melting pot of talent. There are dancers from each coast, the northern and southern states and from across the Atlantic ocean. Jasinski said each dancer has something he or she wants to add to the production.

"It is the kind of ballet you grow up with. Some may have started out performing as a mouse when they were ten or so, and now they may be performing one of the major parts," Jasinski said. "You work your way up."

Special Russian guest dancer, Aleksandr "Sasha" Lunev, is the principal dancer and artistic adviser for "The Nutcracker." Lunev has been acclaimed for his technique in several classical roles.

'Angel' can be both very bold and very boring

ANDY WOODWARD
Collegian

Spanning 30 years and three hours, "An Angel at My Table" is an in-depth look at the psychological horrors of a talented child.

Janet Frame, one of the most famous writers from New Zealand, was an outcast from the schoolyard. She was overweight, had red hair and spent all her time reading. The movie traces Frame's difficulties through her developing years.

REVIEW

Perhaps one of film's lures in the beginning is the fact that the audience isn't sure whether or not Frame is lonely — or just odd — until she herself says she is lonely.

The entire first third of the film is about Frame's childhood and her lack of friends. Her ostracization in childhood is belated to the point of being boring.

Knowing where she came from and why she is the way she is important, but this much of it may turn away audience members. This background is important but not enough to deserve a full third of this 160-minute movie.

Frame's adult experiences are much more intriguing. She is committed to a mental hospital for eight years, misdiagnosed a schizophrenic. Frame's tribulations in the hospital are sad-dening all the more, because the audience knows why she might seem mentally ill.

The brutalities of psychology in the 1950s are aired. Patients who have undergone electroshock therapy, or even a lobotomy, stumble around the ward in a pathetic stupor. These parts of the film are extremely powerful. Audience members are sympathetic toward Frame as they have known the poor outcast since childhood.

The movie itself seemed a bit double-sided. One moment, interest would wander. The next, the movie is intense and gripping. Perhaps a bit too long, and perhaps the more of a Kaleidoscope film, one thing must be said — the cinematography of New Zealand landscapes is incredible.

Frame's writing process is very interesting to observe, but, all in all, the scenes that plod along outnumber those that are gripping.

"An Angel at My Table" was produced in New Zealand and has won more than 20 international film awards.

ARTS

Dancer makes movement speak

Guest artist Riley is devoted to spreading an important message

KIRSTEN NELSON
Collegian

One prominent dancer said she believes her art is more than just beautiful movements.

Deborah Riley, an acclaimed dancer who teaches at Dance Place in Washington, D.C., is currently a guest artist at K-State.

"My role as a guest artist is not just as an instructor of dance, but the technique, specifically from my personal point of view, is giving a personal insight to how I address problems of social concern," Riley said.

"I think of myself as an educator in that respect," she said. "I create dance about a particular thing that I hope the audience will find educational."

"Some may get information about issues they don't know about," Riley said she has been dancing seriously since she was a college undergraduate in 1969.

She has been an artist-in-residence at Dance Place since 1987, and has traveled to the University of California at Santa Barbara, Ohio University, University of Montana, West Virginia University and Mary Washington College.

For K-State's WinterDance '92, Riley will choreograph the student piece "Current Exchange" and perform in a solo work titled "Steel Angel."

Riley deals with feminist issues in her professional work, spanning from the general to the abstract, depending on the choreography, she said.

"Steel Angel" is performed in the abstract, and the issues are portrayed through gesture and movement.

"It deals with an energy of assertiveness and directness, and holding my ground, and not being giving, and not backing off, and not emphasizing traditional feminism," Riley said. "For me, it's like taking a self-assertiveness course."

She also will be teaching master dance classes while at K-State.

"Because of my own situation, working with professional dancers, I enjoy working with students on their way and continuing to that process," she said. "I enjoy touching in with their feelings to exactly what their preparation involves. I learn from them, and they learn from me."

Luke Kahlich, professor of dance and theater, described Riley as a beautiful dancer and a good teacher.

"In Kansas, we don't get to see a lot of professional dancers," Kahlich said. "Students only see the faculty's way of moving. She'll provide an outside look at new movement."

Riley said she hopes students will be inspired to address social issues in their own dancing.

"I hope they find a direct and fierce power in their own dancing," she said.

"To me, dance is not just a form of entertainment. It's a serious art form, in which we think and react and find solutions to very serious and pressing social issues."

Riley is primarily a modern dancer who has performed all over the world. She has been awarded six choreographic fellowships from the National Endowment for the Arts. She is director of Deborah Riley Dance Projects, an all-female dance company that addresses issues of social concern to women.

"In general, her work portrays the myths and roles of women in American culture and society, and trying to get her audience to take a fresh look at those," Kahlich said.

"I create dance about a particular thing that I hope the audience will find educational."

Know the difference between a doctor of medicine and a doctor of chiropractic?

If you're like a lot of people, you may not be quite sure. Here's some information:

Both doctors of medicine and doctors of chiropractic are primary care physicians, and both diagnose. The doctor of medicine uses drugs and surgery while the doctor of chiropractic focuses on natural health-care methods — mainly spinal manipulation and other safe procedures.

Admission requirements to an accredited chiropractic college are similar to those of other major health professions, including medicine, osteopathy, podiatry and optometry. These requirements include a minimum of two to three years of pre-professional college with an emphasis in biological sciences. Then chiropractic colleges require a minimum of four to five academic years of professional resident study. That adds up to six to eight years of college and chiropractic college education to become a chiropractic physician.

Professional study at a chiropractic college includes clinical experience under strict supervision by qualified faculty members. A major part of chiropractic education is devoted to subjects also taught in medical schools — anatomy, biochemistry, microbiology, pathology, public health, diagnosis, X-ray, clinical disciplines, and related health sciences. The remaining years of chiropractic education emphasize practical or clinical studies dealing with the diagnosis and treatment of patients.

The basic difference between chiropractic and medical school is that medical schools provide full instruction in surgery and pharmacology. Because doctors of chiropractic don't prescribe drugs or operate, chiropractic schools devote those hours to chiropractic principles and general and specific manipulative technique. Medical schools generally don't require or offer courses on manipulation or manipulative therapy.

HOW RELIABLE IS CHIROPRACTIC? Recent scientific studies done by medical sources comparing chiropractic care with medical and physical therapy non-surgical care of the back and neck show that doctors of chiropractic can relieve chronic and severe pain in half the time it takes doctors of medicine. That's quite a difference. Those findings were reported in the British Medical Journal in June 1990.

WE — THE KANSAS CHIROPRACTIC FOUNDATION — will bring you more highlights from this important study and other information about chiropractic in a series of educational advertisements in coming weeks. Thanks for taking time to read our first one.

Closing not end of engineering students, Ulrich says junior in engineering technology. "If you mess up once, that's it," he said. "One chance at a class makes you feel like they are pushing us to finish."

Migliazzo said the requirement to get a C or better in all the prerequisite courses is also an added stress.

The required program courses may be completely closed May 1994, but this isn't quite the end of engineering technology students at K-State, Ulrich said.

Students will be allowed to graduate at K-State in this degree one year after the program closes, he said.

Ulrich said there are 82 students in the program, and 11 of them will graduate in December.

Most likely, he said, two or three students will either drop out of the program or transfer to Salina, leaving K-State with approximately 68 students this spring and about 50 next fall.

"I feel they should have closed the Salina campus, since there are only about 750 students there," Migliazzo said.

"The money used to build a new student union building there could have been used on a new building here, and it would have eliminated the duplication of equipment."

The consolidation of the schools is needed, but it has put extra pressure on students to get their degrees here, Voorhees said.

No one wants the added pressure of having to move, he said.

Not unlike the students not wanting to leave Manhattan, most of the seven faculty members have tentative plans to stay here and work elsewhere at K-State.

"Since I have a degree in mechanical engineering, I plan to stay here and teach wherever I am needed," Ulrich said.

Cuts could allow redistribution of funds, Holen says said. "That will save on administrative costs, and we'll put that money into programs."

Holen said by discontinuing the certification program in school library media, that money could be used elsewhere.

"By eliminating library certification, we are transferring the money to those programs we are going to emphasize," he said.

He said the college will continue to emphasize student counseling, personnel services and educational psychology.

"If we had to cut back, we'd keep those programs," Holen said. "We are not going to put any in."

The college is examining alternative responses to long-term educational reform without having to put more money in, he said. The college proposed to establish bilingual and multicultural teaching certification, and develop mediated instructional strategies and materials.

"We want to be more efficient in instruction," Holen said.

The college also wants to capitalize on new computer capabilities, he said.

"We bought $350,000 in computers, but the money to buy them had nothing to do with the elimination of programs," Holen said.

The college proposed to transfer responsibility and resources for the Educational Implications of Human Growth and Development course to the College of Human Ecology.

Holen said this class is large — about 1,200 students take it every year — but the College of Human Ecology teaches a similar class.

He said the College of Education proposes to eliminate the duplicate class and give the money to the College of Human Ecology to teach it.

He said all physical education certification programs and the center for economic education may be eliminated.

Chad Jackson, senior in elementary education and President of the College of Education Ambassadors, said the courses Physical Education for the Elementary School Teacher and Concepts of Personal Health are both three-hour courses.

Jackson said a student only has to take one of these courses now, but next semester, two two-hour courses — Physical Education for the Elementary School Teacher and Sexuality and Health — have to be taken to meet state requirements.

Yeltsin in battle for economic reform extension of his powers to rule by decree if lawmakers would allow him to set economic policy without legislative interference for 12 to 18 months.

Yeltsin's decree-making powers expired Tuesday.

"I'm astonished. He proposed a deal that already is lost," said Oleg Rumantsyev, a reformist lawmaker who has criticized Yeltsin for concentrating too much power in the presidency.

A leading hard-line legislator, Sergei Baburin, a founder of the National Salvation Front, said Yeltsin's proposal was not even worth a legislative battle.

"These are silly ideas and silly proposals, and the results for Yeltsin will be embarrassing," Baburin said.

Outside the Kremlin, several hundred demonstrators carrying red Communist hammer-and-sickle banners pushed through a police line and endured zero temperatures to chant anti-Yeltsin slogans as lawmakers crossed Red Square.

Hundreds of pro-reform coal miners also shouted at deputies as they entered Spassky Gate.

Yeltsin's compromise proposal drew sharp criticism from the 1,041-member body.

Even reform lawmakers said prospects were slim for the plan, which would preserve many of the sweeping powers Yeltsin has held since the failed hard-line coup in August 1991.

The Congress opened in tumult Tuesday as an obscure Siberian lawmaker, Ivan Fedoseyev, challenged Yeltsin's signing of a pact with Belarus and Ukraine on Dec. 8, 1991, ending the Soviet Union and founding the Commonwealth of Independent States.

Fedoseyev wanted Russia's Constitutional Court to rule whether Yeltsin's actions "give reason for his impeachment."

As Yeltsin watched stony-faced from the dais, the proposal lost 429-352.

The results showed Yeltsin's supporters have the strength to stave off attacks by hard-liners, but it also indicated his foes form a solid core of opposition.

The Congress, meeting for the seventh time since it was elected in 1990, is dominated by former Communists, who make up 86 percent, or 912, of the members.

Parent ponders preparing daughter for college life

YOU'RE ASKING ME?
by Cassandra Duveaux

DEAR CASSANDRA,
My daughter is a high-school senior. We are from a small town near Manhattan. Her weekend curfew is midnight, and she is not allowed to cruise Aggieville. My problem is that she thinks I am being over-protective. One of her arguments is that if she were allowed to go to Aggieville, she would be better prepared to deal with being a K-State freshman next year and would fit in better.
I would like to know your views on this and possibly from some K-State freshman out there who have been through being new on the scene.
Pondering Parent

DEAR PONDERING PARENT,
As long as your daughter is living at home, your curfew rules apply and should be respected by your daughter. It is your home.
However, the senior year in high school is not only the culmination of one phase, but also the beginning of and transition to another. Some thought should be given on how to best accommodate this transformation.

I personally find your daughter's argument lacking. From experience, I can tell you nothing about Aggieville demands preparation that should not have already been gained regarding life in general.
Her desire is simply her way of saying she wants more freedom, which is going to come rather abruptly as she starts college anyway. It is the combined pressure of school work, a sustained absence from home and the newly acquired freedom to make one's own decisions that is the true "shock" to most freshmen.
Only you can be the judge as to the maturity of your daughter. My advice is to write your house rules in concrete, but between now and next fall, begin to slowly loosen the reigns on your daughter's other activities as she demonstrates she can handle the freedom in a mature manner. If you haven't taught her how to use common sense by now, then you have a lot of ground to cover between now and the start of college.

DEAR CASSANDRA,
I have a problem that has been bothering me for years. People constantly tell me to "smile" or say, "It isn't that bad, is it?" After a while, it has made me wonder if I am depressed. I constantly think of things that are depressing. I tend to worry a lot, and I usually don't smile unless I consciously think about it.
In general, while I realize that there are lots of good things in my life (friends, boyfriend, job) I tend to concentrate on what is bad. My sisters have both gone through some therapy for similar reasons, and I guess I might need some also.
My problem is, I don't know where to go to get counseling, because I don't have the money to pay for it. I just need to "cheer up," and I can't seem to do it. I really do have it pretty good, but I can't help but be unhappy. I want to smile and be happy. What can I do?
A.J.

DEAR A.J.,
You should consult your physician for a recommendation to the appropriate source for a professional diagnosis. In many cases, medical insurance will cover some or all of the costs of consultation and treatment.

There are several forms of depression, which can be fairly obvious and undisguised, or "masked" and not immediately obvious at all. Everyone gets the "blues" now and then, and this form can be distinguished from a more serious, clinical form of depression by its longevity. The "blues" are usually temporary.
In its undisguised form, the more serious form of depression has these characteristics: a chronic change of mood, an extended lowering of the spirits, or a loss of enjoyment of things and activities that have usually made life enjoyable. A dull, tired, empty, sad, even numb feeling pervades in many cases.
There are behavioral symptoms as well: irritability, excessive concern with small annoyances or minor problems, impaired memory and ability to concentrate, loss of sexual desire, difficulty in getting going in the morning and excessive feelings of guilt.

Physical symptoms include appetite and weight loss, disturbed sleep, fatigue, headache, dizziness, indigestion, sometimes heart palpitations, chest constriction and pain in the area of the heart.
Today, depression can almost invariably be overcome, no matter how severe. And that is something to smile about.

Teagarden praised by Glasscock

He said he has helped initiate several programs in the interest of children and would like to do more.

The Family Preservation Act, designed to keep families together and reduce the amount of foster care, is one program. Another is based on the Head Start philosophy of helping preschool children.

"This one is geared more toward parents than children," Teagarden said. "It's called 'Parents as Teachers' and helps parents to get children started in the learning process."

Teagarden said he has good memories of K-State.

"There isn't a better place to go to school," he said. "There are a lot of good universities in the state, but each one is unique. It just depends on your field."

Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan, said he is impressed by Teagarden. "He's on the other side of the aisle, but I really admire him," Glasscock said.

He said Teagarden is knowledgeable and fair and has treated him with respect and consideration.

"He's a quiet, unassuming guy, doesn't talk a lot," Glasscock said. "Kind of the legislative equivalent to the Marlboro man."

He said although Teagarden is quiet, what he says is worth listening to.

"He makes sense and comes to the point," Glasscock said. "He is highly respected within his party, and across the aisle as well."

Glasscock said he thinks Teagarden has the kind of attitude and working relationship that has a tendency to build a rapport that is very effective.

"He will have the ability to work with the Republicans in a bipartisan relationship," he said. "He can pull them together to really move the House agenda forward."

Riley says dance language

"They need to know how strongly the art can speak to the issue," he said. "It can be pretty, but it's also important to the message it carries."

In 1989, Riley created a dance to celebrate the anniversary of the United Nations document on "The Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women."

"Should all members sign and agree, it would put into international law social, political and economical laws that won't allow for discrimination of women," Riley said. "I hope to live to see the day it's passed."

The wonderful thing about dance is communication, she said. It's a form of body language.

"It gives me my life energy," she said. "I think it's healthy physically and mentally to dance."

"It pulls together the body, mind and spirit equally, and I need that to be a whole person."

Kansas Appeals Court visits MHS

PHOTOS BY CRAIG HACKER/Collegian

Teacher arranges for judges, attorneys to teach students system

If the people can't go to the court, then bring the court to the people.

That's what the social studies department at Manhattan High School did when the Kansas Court of Appeals took advantage of an invitation to meet Wednesday at the MHS auditorium.

As part of the Law Related Education Program being instituted by state schools, social studies teacher Beth Denney was able to arrange for the court to make an appearance.

"I had heard they had gone to another school," Denney said. "And it was just a matter of writing them and asking them to come."

District Judge Paul Miller said in his introduction that appearances at the high-school level are not common.

"This is only the fourth high-school appearance by the court," Miller said. "They meet frequently at junior colleges."

Denney, who also serves as the Law Related Education Program coordinator at MHS, said this session was planned to help students understand the workings of the court.

"They're so used to this TV stuff, where things are wrapped up in a half hour or an hour," she said. "They don't realize cases like this can take as long as two years to reach a final verdict."

She said the cases seen on shows like "L.A. Law" are all tied up in emotion and solved on an emotional basis.

"Things like this may seem boring in comparison, but they are far more real," she said.

Before beginning the session, the three judges gave a press conference explaining the working order of the court. In these sessions there is no testimony, only the lawyers giving arguments on their clients' behalf.

Ten judges serve on the appellate court, who travel to districts throughout the state trying cases. Three judges sit at each hearing.

The judges who appeared in Manhattan were Robert L. Lewis Jr., Edward Larson and G. Joseph Pierron. They heard appeals on three cases, one originating in Junction City, one in Hays and one in Cloud County.

The 600 students in attendance were

Security Council to vote today

ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS — U.S. military commanders will have to give up the free rein they had in the Persian Gulf War and accept some U.N. oversight of troops in Somalia, including when to withdraw, diplomats said Wednesday.

Before a closed-door Security Council meeting, which ended late Wednesday, the president of the 15-member council, Ambassador Chinmaya Gharekhan of India, said a vote will be taken Thursday on whether to use military force in Somalia.

A U.S. draft resolution for the Security Council leaves the door open for a U.S. general to command a proposed American force in the famine-wracked nation. Diplomats also said daily operations will probably be left to field commanders.

Pentagon sources have said 12,000 to 20,000 U.S. troops might be sent to Somalia to get food

COCA-COLA BOWL

Band's trip to Toyko a no go

ROY GRABER

K-State's pep band won't be going to Tokyo. Band director Ben Rohrer, instructor of music, said the band was informed by the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics there was a possibility of a trip to Tokyo to play during the K-State vs. Nebraska Coca-Cola Bowl.

Rohrer said a Japanese telecommunications firm offered to pay the expenses to send band members from both universities.

"As far as the game itself, none of the money for the expense would come from us," Rohrer said. "That was really thrilling for us."

Rohrer said they were later notified that the trip was canceled, due to the fact that Nebraska's pep band declined the offer.

"What happened was the Nebraska band director didn't want to take his band," Rohrer said. "He told me his reasoning was that they already had a traditional performance that weekend, and also he said he doesn't believe in breaking up the band."

Rohrer said the telecommunication firm's offer would not allow all band members from both schools to go.

"When the Japanese found out about it, they

REDEFINING K-STATE ACADEMICS

Changes possible at top

Administration also affected by aspirations proposals at K-State

ROY GRABER
Collegian

EDITOR'S NOTE: The Kansas Board of Regents has called for new Role and Aspirations Statements from each state university. This is the final story in a series on what K-State's colleges are doing to fulfill this mandate.

The Role and Aspirations proposal has not only made changes in academic programs, but in University staff and administration as well.

Chuck Reagan, assistant to the president, said the process has helped the current administration see opportunities to be more effective and efficient.

"The purpose of administration is to make it possible for the faculty to teach students in an environment they can learn in," Reagan said. "We also see that the faculty can do research and service."

Tom Rawson, vice-president of administration and finance, said some of the major changes include the merging of different departments.

The areas of planning and engineering services will be combined with the utilities services to form one entity.

"Under this new concept, there will be an office of engineering and architectural services," Rawson said. "This includes the design of buildings and building maintenance all under one central office. By streamlining the organizations, I think this will improve efficiency and improve communications for the people designing buildings and doing maintenance."

Rawson said in addition to bringing departments together, they hope to create more unity within the Manhattan and Salina campuses, particularly in the fee-payment structures. Rawson said he thinks

►YUGOSLAVIA LOSES RELIEF; FIGHTING RAGES

SARAJEVO, Bosnia-Herzegovina (AP) — No food relief reached Sarajevo on Wednesday as fighting raged in the city's outskirts, and Bosnian defenders battled what they said was one of the heaviest Serb tank offensives.

Outside the capital near the Croatian-held town of Kiseljak, a Danish U.N. peacekeeper was reported kidnapped by uniformed men.

The Dane, a corporal whose name was not released, was seen in the back of a car accompanied by two identified men wearing combat fatigues, said Sgt. Antonio de Frutos, a spokesman for the peacekeepers.

More than 17,000 people have been killed and 110,000 wounded in a civil war that began after Bosnia's Croat and Muslim majority voted for independence in February. More than 1 million people have been forced from their homes.

Sarajevo's vital relief airlift was suspended Tuesday after a U.S. Air Force transport plane was hit by small-arms fire while approaching the airport.

Senate prepares for last meeting

AMY WRIGHT
Collegian

Student Senate faces a busy agenda tonight as it convenes for its last meeting of the year.

Senate will vote tonight on the statement to Lafene Health Center concerning the cost and confidentiality of pregnancy and HIV-related testing procedures.

Senate did remove a section in the statement asking for free testing procedures, said Student Body President Jackie McCluskey.

Senate will also hear a motion tonight to reconsider the Bramlage Coliseum fee continuance. McCluskey said the bill is being brought back to Senate, because it was overshadowed by the Athletic Fee and because of low attendance at the Nov. 19 meeting when the bill was voted on.

In other business, Senate will hear first readings of bills including a fee increase for KSDB-FM 91.9, a revision of Student Government Association's funding regulations, and a modification of Holton Hall Services.

DB92 is a student-operated station that serves K-State and the Manhattan area. If the DB92 bill is passed, it will raise full-time fees from 85 cents to 95 cents, and part-time fees from 50 cents to 55 cents per student each semester. The bill, if passed, will also increase the fee for summer students per credit hour, up to 6 hours, from 10 to 15 cents.

The bill concerning the revision of SGA funding regulations updates Senate's allocation procedures for

'90210' actress gets in bar fight

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WEST HOLLYWOOD, Calif. — A brawl broke out early Wednesday at a Sunset Boulevard nightclub and when it was over, "Beverly Hills 90210" star Shannen Doherty and an aspiring actress were slapped with misdemeanors.

The fight began after Doherty's date, co-star Brian Austin Green, stepped on the toes of Bonita Money's boyfriend, authorities said.

"The girls started shoving each other around. Both women were adamant about having each other arrested," said Sheriff's Deputy Roger Hom.

Doherty's publicist, Susan Culley, said: "It is our understanding that the woman (Money) decided to file charges only after she had been cited and escorted from the club."

Money, speaking by phone from her car, said she couldn't talk about the incident because she had sold exclusive rights of her version of events to the television show "A Current Affair." Her manager then got on the phone and said Money would consider interviews, for a price, Friday.

Green, 21, and Money's escort, George Jackson, 34, didn't get involved in the fight and weren't cited, Hom said.

Doherty plays Brenda Walsh, the sometime girlfriend of heartthrob Luke Perry's character, on the Fox network show about pampered high-school students. Green plays David Silver.

Doherty, 21, and Money, 32, who weren't hurt, were issued misdemeanor battery citations and released. They must appear in Municipal Court Dec. 22 for arraignment.

Workshop examines attitudes

Judy Davis, Women's Resource Center director, speaks about sex and violence Wednesday during a Rape Awareness Workshop.

LIANA RIESINGER
Collegian

One in four college women has either been raped or has experienced an attempted rape.

About 15 people gathered Wednesday night in Holton Hall to hear Rebecca Carney, Assistant Director of Women's Resource Center talk about violence against women.

Carney and Judy Davis, Director of Women's Resource Center, spoke at the Rape Awareness Workshop entitled "Rape and Popular Culture."

Davis began the workshop by emphasizing the negative effect that vulgar language in movies has on American society and on the roles males and females play.

"I think the media's glorification of violence against women creates an environment in which rape flourishes," Davis said.

The first 15 minutes of the movie, "Full Metal Jacket" was shown to illustrate Davis' point.

"There are differential values put on womanly and manly things. These are hard to notice, because we're a part of it," she said.

Davis said that when in the movie, the sergeant calls the male soldiers, "ladies," it depicts a ladylike stereotype of wimpiness and lack of bravery.

"Women are brave, especially through childbirth. Yet, we (society) don't see it as a brave act. Risking one's life to bring another life into this world is brave," Davis said.

Davis attributes several things to the desensitization in our society towards sex and violence.

"MTV, rap music, specifically 2 Live Crew, pornography, and sexual explicitness saturate our lives," Davis said. "I fear the influence of rap music because it depicts women as objects for beating and for sex. Lyrics explicitly, enthusiastically and violently

Monetary struggles plague Russia

ASSOCIATED PRESS

MOSCOW — Acting Prime Minister Yegor Gaidar told a jeering Congress on Wednesday that the Russian people are smarter and more patient than the hard-liners who are trying to dump his government and block reforms.

But conservative lawmakers simply returned the fire against Gaidar and President Boris Yeltsin during an inconclusive second day of debate in the Congress of People's Deputies, Russia's highest legislative body.

Neither side yet commanded enough votes in the 1,041-member body to prevail in the battle over Gaidar's administration, which hard-liners say is leading the country to poverty and collapse. Yeltsin and Gaidar call the current troubles a painful but necessary step toward a market economy.

Gaidar conceded the government's program had failed to tame inflation, now 25 percent a month. But he said a declining number of strikes and public protests indicated growing public acceptance of the switch to a free-market economy.

"There is no threat of hunger and cold. We have passed through the period of adaptation to reforms without social upheaval," Gaidar said.

"Despite all the hardships resulting from the changes, despite all the obstacles that still must be overcome, the Russian people turn out to be smarter than politicians think."

"The people clearly understand the need for reform and are ready to work, rather than rock the boat of our well-being and future," he said.

The opposition was not swayed. "Gaidar is a con man," said Mikhail Astafiyev, a leader of the hard-line Russian Unity faction in Congress.

"He will almost certainly have to resign," said Dmitri Stepanov, another Russian Unity member.

Hard-liners want to slow Yeltsin's economic changes and drop Gaidar, the architect of the reforms.

Yeltsin has resisted lawmakers' demands that he nominate a prime minister for approval by the Congress. Because Gaidar is only "acting" prime minister, Yeltsin has not had to submit his nomination. Yeltsin has said he will not submit it unless forced to by Congress.

If one person is reached, awareness weeks and cultural history months are successful.

Bernard Franklin, assistant dean of student life, said he didn't get caught up in numbers when talking about the effectiveness of the various months and weeks of recognition that occur throughout the year.

"Just one person can impact five other people," he said.

Diana Caldwell, coordinator of Multicultural Student Organizations, said the cultural and ethnic recognition events are successful from two standpoints.

"Not only do they allow other people to be familiar with other cultures, but they also help people learn about their own cultures," she said.

She said she thought people tend to ignore people they don't understand and take inappropriate attitudes toward them.

"Our goals are primarily to create a cultural understanding among the various populations that make up our campus," she said.

She said she also felt people who see their heritage and culture being celebrated, feel more of a sense of belonging in the campus community.

Funds, firms help museum

LANE ALLISON

K-State's latest object d'art is now one step closer to completion.

An anonymous Manhattan resident has donated $13,000 to the University Foundation to create an operating endowment for the Marianna Kistler Beach Art Museum.

Museum director Nelson Britt said the endowment will be used to generate funds to support programs and exhibits the museum will sponsor.

"Our goal is to have a total endowment of $1 million," Britt said. "The interest on the principle of this fund will support traveling exhibits as well as local educational programs and regional outreach activities."

"The success of any art museum depends on the strength and size of its permanent endowment," he said.

"Comparatively, brick and mortar money is easy to raise, but without an endowment, a museum is little more than a shell that houses a permanent collection."

Murder problem has answers

THE ISSUE

America is the world leader in violent crimes.

WE SUGGEST

We need to educate our children in the home and school to have respect for all human life.

A new study is a stark reminder of the job Bill Clinton has ahead of him.

The United States ranks No. 1 in the world in murders, sexual assaults and other violent attacks, according to the National Research Council.

In 1991, there were 24,704 murders in the United States. That's roughly half the number of American soldiers killed during the Vietnam War — in just one year.

Americans are killing Americans. People everywhere have an anxious fear that makes them afraid to leave their homes after dark.

And it's not just in the "big city."

Just as people in New York are afraid to take to subway home alone, people in Wichita fear drive-by shootings, and K-State students are afraid to walk across this very campus alone at night.

It seems the police are unable to prevent or protect people from crime. And our nation's schools have turned into battlefields where kids don't learn to respect one another.

The killers are getting younger. We're losing a generation to wars on our own streets.

What our president-elect must realize is this nation can never be economically stable, nor can it continue to be a world power if it is not socially stable.

The key is the children.

"Family values" became something to joke about during this campaign. But it isn't. Family values need to be pushed. The government just shouldn't decide for the people what is a family and what values are OK.

Fix the schools. A nation with so much wealth and resources should be embarrassed by the education most of our children receive.

Fix the economy.

Equally important is a commitment from Clinton to family, values and respect for human life.

But it must begin in the home and continue in schools. In decent, solid schools.

You can find a real date in Lawrence

Like many Collegian readers, I'm tired of reading about people who can't get dates in Cassandra Duveaux's "You're Asking Me?"

Part of my fatigue is just because I don't like whining, and part is because "nice" people are so boring. At any rate, these people may have a legitimate complaint — that it is too hard to meet people here — and the only way I can see to get rid of them is to try to solve their problem.

JOHN HAWKS

So, I was reading in the Nov. 3 University Daily Kansan — I know, that's something like Captain Kirk reading the Klingon News — and I happened upon the "Jaytalk Meeting Network." This half of the back page was totally devoted to meeting people.

These are real personal ads, not the washed-out Greek garbage that runs in our paper. ("Delta Barb, you're a hot dot!" Oh, please.)

"Extraordinarily loud, obnoxious, outgoing, front-man, seeks an insanely independent knockout to rebuild faith in no head-trip pseudo relationships ... Drug users need not respond." This is real stuff.

"SWM, 25, ... have all my teeth intact, although a few are a little out of whack. Just bought a brand new tie. Looking for someone with a color TV to tear me away from my studies. PLEASE HELP ME! I've only seen Seinfeld once!!"

There is someone here for everyone. Men seeking women: "SWM 21 6'2" ... If you love soft music under candlelight, and if you want to share nights like this in my arms, give me a call. Let my European accent entertain you through the night." Yecch!

Women seeking men: "Oriental Love Goddess seeks well-bred athletic stud to join me in leisurous and adventurous activities. ... Dog haters and bible-thumpers need not apply."

Men seeking men: "Looking for an authoritative frat man, who enjoys Garth Brooks and claims to be a real cowboy. Who one day could hate me; the next day lasso me like a scared calf running in the dark."

Apparently placing an ad is free. When you place an ad, you call a free 800 number to record a voice message for those interested. After your ad runs, you call a free 800 number to listen to respondents. From there, you choose who to call and set up a date.

The profits come from those responding to ads, who call a 900 number to listen to the voice message of the ad they are interested in. They are all printed with voice box numbers so readers can hear them before they decide to leave a number. I guess all this talking helps screen out Hannibal Lecter-types.

For those wanting to meet "nice" guys or girls, not all the ads are flamboyant. Some are concise: "Wanted: quiet, polite, smalltown honor student, 18-25."

Some sound like they have the same problems as Cassandra readers: "SWF seeks SWM under 5'9". Must have blue or green eyes and own a good pair of Levis and hiking boots. No acid washed jeans. Sick of meeting guys in bars. I'm 5'11" with green eyes. If you want to hang out, give me a call."

Some are discreet: "Clean cut, good-looking and discreet fraternity guy seeks the same ... The ads as a whole are reflective of the concerns of a college campus. "HIV negative" appears a lot. The writers are interested in something genuine, someone who isn't superficial. They seek, and they may find.

Perhaps the idea could fly here. I don't know. At any rate, it's my suggestion to shut the whiners up. And it could provide some entertainment to boot.

I'll leave with a poem: "If you like Jagermeister, and getting caught in the fog of McKinleyville; if you're into Chinese food and not into cheap champagne; if you like making love at midnight in the dunes of Trinidad — you're the love that I've looked for, come with me and escape: Okay, so it doesn't rhyme, but you know what I mean. #20099" How beautiful.

OTHER VIEWPOINTS

Earlier this year, investigators found that the U.S. Department of Agriculture had paid farmers hundreds of thousands of dollars not to grow surplus crops on land leased from the government. A new investigation regarding support payments has uncovered a similarly absurd and equally indefensible waste of federal tax dollars by the USDA. It's even more alarming because it involves a much greater volume of taxpayer's dollars.

The investigation suggests tens of millions of dollars may have been wasted by the agency's Soil Conservation Service, which has authorized payments to ensure soil conservation to farmers who have done little toward that end. As a result, the agency's mandated conservation goals are being subverted and, as one observer noted, the agency is effectively subsidizing erosion.

The Associated Press, which obtained a copy of the USDA inspector general's report, says investigators found that many SCS offices place little priority on either enforcing the requirements of support programs or punishing recipients who violate program standards.

In the previously mentioned report, the General Accounting Office found that farmers were being paid $3.2 million in support payments for producing surplus crops on federal land, and $800,000 not to produce crops on lands leased from the government for agricultural purposes.

Those findings and the latest probe results should be cause for a comprehensive review of the nation's farm support programs. Taxpayers need assurances that the nation's farm subsidies are administered by a bureaucracy that hasn't lost touch with the reasons that these programs exist.

The Post and Courier, Charleston, S.C.

Washington's dramatic offer of U.S. troops to help the United Nations deliver food in war-riven Somalia is sure to encounter a host of objections — that it would violate Somalia's sovereignty; that it would have no lasting peace.

All of these run up against two incontrovertible facts: mass starvation is under way in Somalia, and previous international efforts have failed to stop it.

Would such a large, uninvited military force represent interference in Somalia's internal affairs? Certainly. But in a country with no effective government, and hundreds of thousands of starving citizens, this seems a trifling complaint.

► RELIGION

Columnist's elitism only alienates readers

Editor,

I am writing in regards to the columns that John Hart and Scott Spradlin have written thus far this school year. I am a Christian in their sense of the word, as well as my own.

It seems that every time I read one of their columns, I am left with a bad taste in my mouth. I do not disagree with a majority of their opinions. I simply disagree with their use of tact, or lack thereof. It seems that if they truly desired to affect change they would not practice the politics of division.

By isolating themselves in a glass tower, they have alienated themselves from a majority of the populace. People who live in glass towers should not throw stones. John 8:1-11. Luke 6:36, 37.

It appears that Mr. Hart and Mr. Spradlin use the Bible as a sword to vindicate their personal and/or conservative agendas rather than as a light to illuminate truth. I would remind them that most swords have two sides and are not very discriminatory toward whom they cut.

Most problems can be solved by putting into practice the two greatest commandments, Mark 12:30, 31.

► FEMINISM AND PC

Stereotypes, poor sources hurt writings

Editor,

If the examples of the columns of John Hart on feminism and being politically correct are typical, his standards of evidence are too low for an academic community. The two pieces reveal a pattern that suggest he has, in fact, no substantial evidence at all. I am afraid he does not seem to have had any real dialogue with human feminists or "PCers" about their actual beliefs, but simply created handy stereotypes.

Angry letters to the editor about Hart's views on feminism didn't comment on this unfortunate lack of evidence. He summarizes so-called "feminist" views, accompanied by an unpleasant anecdote told second-hand. Only one researcher was quoted, Carol Gilligan, who said some things about women Hart agreed with and used to attack feminists. He mistakes her conclusions and conveniently forgets to mention that she, too, happens to be a feminist. You'd never know that from his column, or that there are different and changing views among feminists. Quite simply, the general feminism he attacks doesn't exist.

The problem seems to get worse in the PC column, which is more incoherent. Though he begins by helpfully conceding that there may be no "membership" in PC, that's really the only way he seems to be able to think about it — as a label. The PC concept begins in his column as a belief in tolerance and later becomes a belief in absolute relativism and then drops out entirely when he himself claims to have a belief in tolerance. He doesn't name anybody who shares all the collective "beliefs" at once, because he couldn't.

His usage of the term "politically correct" might be more coherent if he told us how the term began, that is, as a criticism of those on the political left made against others on the left who, though sharing political ideas, were sometimes guilty of applying them unthinkingly. The term makes some sense, then, if you are applying it to something someone actually says. Something you think is an unquestioned, unreflective or unearned opinion; it is not itself a "belief." If Hart simply wants to observe that there are lots of liberals in the academic community, that's hardly news. But, as in the feminism column, the general belief he attacked as "PC" simply doesn't exist.

► STUDENT SENATE

Senators are quite capable of self-defense

Editor,

Reasonable persons are fully capable of assimilating the same information and coming to different conclusions.

The difference is in our experience and in our perceptions of reality. Thus, reasonable student senators could sit through the same six hours of debate on the Athletic Fee issue and argue honestly and passionately on differing sides of the question. From my perspective, it was not an easy vote, and I found myself torn between the various subtleties of the argument.

I would point out to Gary W. Beck, whose paid advertisement appeared in the Nov. 30 Collegian, that Senator Joel Gruenke, who opposed the increase in the Athletic Fee, did so honestly and passionately after having done a good deal of personal research. Sen. Gruenke and I happened to disagree on this particular issue, but I can assure Mr. Beck that Sen. Gruenke is not narrow-minded, nor is he a single issue senator. He is an exceptionally thoughtful senator who has the respect of the Senate body, even when he finds himself on the losing side of an issue. As a matter of fact, he was voted the Outstanding Student Senator in 1991 by his colleagues.

Furthermore, I would point out that Gary Beck's late son, Barry Beck, was also a respected and hard-working member of Student Senate and he did, indeed, work hard to pass the original Athletic Fee legislation. Barry, like Joel, was an enthusiastic and passionate debater, always earning the respect of the Senate Body, regardless of how the vote turned out. Reasonable people may reasonably choose to disagree.

As for the letter not being accepted because of its "slandorous" tone, this reasonable person would have put it on the Opinion Page. Student senators, like Collegian columnists, should know that rhetorical slings and arrows come with the territory. Sen. Gruenke (like the other 56 senators) is more than capable of defending himself, in part because of the amount of practice he gets at Senate meetings. Democracy is a contact sport where the only injury suffered is a bruised ego. Not the worst thing that might happen in a lifetime.

EDUCATION

'Gay education' opposed by board

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — The city's education chief suspended an elected school board Tuesday that had balked at a grade-school curriculum that teaches respect for homosexual parents.

School Chancellor Joseph Fernandez appointed three members of his staff to replace the nine-member school board in District 24 in Queens beginning Wednesday until it agrees "not to sabotage an approved curriculum."

As chancellor, Fernandez has the power to supersede the local school boards and order the district superintendent to implement a new curriculum approved by the Board of Education. He also can suspend the entire school board as a last resort and appoint substitute trustees until the suspension ends.

The sticking point in the "Children of the Rainbow" curriculum was a section that teaches tolerance of traditional, divorced and homosexual parents. The guide also promotes racial and cultural harmony.

"Opponents have latched onto some of the language in the guide, taken it out of context, and used it to fuel their campaign of misinformation and distortion," Fernandez said at a news conference. He stressed that the curriculum does not discuss sex or sexuality, and "is in no way 'gay education.'"

"In a city as diverse and much-too-often divided as ours, we have become increasingly alarmed by the proliferation of hate," Fernandez said.

Mary Cummins, District 24 board president, has said the curriculum's homosexual references promote ideals opposed by parents in a largely middle-class, Catholic area.

On Monday, the District 24 board's members skipped a meeting with Fernandez to discuss the issue. He said the board also had refused a mediator.

The Board of Education adopted the guide last year.

Five school boards originally refused to implement it. Fernandez gave them until Oct. 31 to propose alternatives. All but District 24 did.

PARTY ON, BILL

Clinton to start job on bus trip

ASSOCIATED PRESS

■ Clinton will cap Inauguration Day, Jan. 20, with 10 invitation-only, black-tie balls. Tickets will sell for $125.

WASHINGTON — President-elect Clinton will start his inaugural celebration with a trademark bus trip and end it with a White House open house, mixing invitation-only affairs with lots of free events for ordinary Americans, organizers said Wednesday.

Clinton wants "an open inaugural, an accessible inaugural and a dignified inaugural," said Democratic National Committee Chairman Ronald H. Brown, who also chairs the Presidential Inaugural Committee.

"It very much reflects the kind of campaign that Bill Clinton and Al Gore ran."

The five days of festivities from Jan. 17-21 will cost less than $20 million, paid for by private contributions and sales of tickets and souvenirs, Brown said.

There will be at least eight free events, including a concert and fireworks at the Lincoln Memorial, an outdoor festival nearby on the Capital mall, as well as several events aimed at young people.

At an "American Gala" Jan. 18 that is open to the public, the price of admission will be a donation of food or clothing to the homeless.

Clinton will cap Inauguration Day, Jan. 20, with 10 invitation-only, black-tie balls for about 65,000 people. Tickets will sell for $125.

But Brown said the bus trip on Jan. 17, not the balls, will set the tone.

The ride will begin at Thomas Jefferson's Virginia home, Monticello. It will be a mini-version of Clinton's campaign bus tours, complete with stops along the way and a well-publicized route so crowds can gather by the roadside.

The decision to begin the festivities outside the capital was designed to show the inaugural is not just a Washington insiders' affair, committee members said.

"It is not just meant to signify what touched the American people during the course of the campaign but to really touch American history and the fact that it is more than just what happens in Washington but how we bring our nation and our people together," Brown said.

When Clinton arrives in Washington, he will go to the Lincoln Memorial for a public concert and fireworks. Like Clinton, both Jefferson and Abraham Lincoln were presidents "at a time when government and the people were estranged," said Rahm Emanuel, the committee's co-director.

TO THE WOMEN OF ALPHA XI DELTA

Homecoming Week was a blast!
Too bad it could not last!
First place was not ours to be had!
But, for this we are not sad.
For it was a truer test for you women you see,
To still be standing by the weekend festivities.
You all showed us the best, and proved us wrong.
Have you ever seen a girl look that good while pulling the mega bong?
Oris led us along our way,
As we partied through the night and into another day.
In closing we bid you ladies a hardy farewell.
With the fines totalled we aren't looking so well!
But, you know what, that's alright you see,
Because it's better to lose and have fun with an Alpha Xi.

Lady Cats to face 0-1 Northern Iowa

"Offensively, they will pound the ball inside because they post real big."

SUE DORAN
Associate head coach

TONYA FOSTER
Collegian

The Lady Cats, 1-0, play the University of Northern Iowa for the first time in K-State history at 7 tonight at Bramlage Coliseum.

Sue Doran, K-State's associate head coach, said Northern Iowa has improved since last year and is re-building, much like K-State.

Northern Iowa coach Terri Lasswell is a Kansas native and a former K-State assistant. She worked for three seasons under Head Coach Matilda Mossman. She has been a head coach for four years, all with Northern Iowa, and has a career record of 15-66.

Lasswell's basketball career began at K-State, where she played one season before transferring to Washburn University. There she earned all-conference honors in both basketball and volleyball.

Doran said Northern Iowa, 0-1, will most likely play man-to-man defense with full-court pressure.

"Offensively, they will pound the ball inside because they post real big," Doran said. "But they have a couple of good perimeter shooters."

The Panthers are lead by 5-8 senior guard Ann Miller and 6-1 junior center Chris Robbins. Last season, Miller led the team in every offensive category and was the only player to score double figures in 21 out of 27 games.

Robbins posted a double-double with 14 points and 11 rebounds in Tuesday night's game against Missouri-Kansas City.

Doran said if the team improves on rebounding and defensive intensity along with maintaining balanced scoring and taking care of the ball, the team will play a good game.

"We have to be physically strong on defense," Doran said. "To be successful, we'll have to also handle the ball well."

The Lady Cats will start senior leaders Kelly Moylan and Leah Honeycutt. In K-State's season opening victory Tuesday night against Missouri-Rolla, Moylan, guard, scored 17 points and made six of her 11 shots. Honeycutt, a forward, led all scorers with 19.

Schott investigated

Cincinnati Reds' owner accused of being racist

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Even as baseball's executive council appointed a committee to investigate Cincinnati Reds owner Marge Schott, new allegations were made today.

The San Francisco Chronicle and USA Today reported accounts of remarks attributed to Schott.

Both newspapers quoted former Reds employees as saying Schott used the description "Jew bastards," in addition to her alleged anti-black racial slurs.

Roger Blaemire, who directed the Reds business operations for nine months in 1985-1986, told the Chronicle that Schott's slurs aimed at blacks and Jews were "common knowledge" inside the organization and within major league baseball for years.

Blaemire said he first heard Schott refer to a black player as a nigger in September 1985 during a meeting in the office of then-general manager Bill Bergesch.

Blaemire said he was present when Bergesch told Schott the team was providing a helicopter to transport outfielder Dave Parker back and forth to Pittsburgh to testify at a trial regarding baseball drug use.

"Marge said, 'Well, he's the million-dollar nigger. He can rent his own.'"

Blaemire also said Schott used the slur against outfielder Eric Davis, calling him "the troublemaking nigger" because he didn't like the color of the team's shoes.

Blaemire also said Schott called Melvin and Herb Simon, owners of the Indiana Pacers of the NBA, "Jew bastards."

When he was trying to negotiate a deal with the TicketMaster ticket agency, of which the Simons are part owners, Blaemire said he told Schott it would make the team a lot of money.

"And Marge said, 'I'm not dealing with those Jew bastards.'"

Blaemire, who left the Pacers for the Reds, was fired by Schott the day before the opening of the 1986 season.

"She owed me a lot of money — wouldn't pay me a nickel," said Blaemire, who sued Schott and won, then settled out of court.

He currently is president of Blackhawk Communications, which owns two radio stations in Santa Maria in Southern California.

USA Today reported that a man sitting next to Schott on an airplane heard her referring to Parker as a "million-dollar nigger."

Joe Pfaffl, president of a management consulting firm and Butler County Republican finance chairman in Ohio, told USA Today that Schott made racial remarks about Parker during a flight to Cincinnati in December 1987. Parker was traded to Oakland on Dec. 8, 1987.

"She was bragging that she'd just traded that 'goddamn nigger,'" Pfaffl said. "She said, 'We got rid of that trouble-making nigger.'"

Baseball's 11-member executive council met for about one hour in a telephone conference call Tuesday and decided to appoint the committee "to investigate the alleged racial and ethnic remarks attributed" to Schott.

NATION FOOTBALL LEAGUE

Byrd, Jets looking to move on

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — It was back to a normal schedule for the New York Jets. But it will never really be normal again for them.

The Jets resumed practice today, preparing for Sunday's game at Buffalo. If the practices lack intensity or focus, it should be completely understandable.

While they were back on the job, fallen teammate Dennis Byrd was undergoing surgery. Byrd broke a vertebra in his neck against the Kansas City Chiefs three days ago and has paralysis below the shoulders and some spinal damage, although doctors said he does have some sensory function in his legs and motion of his upper arms.

A surgical team began operating at 7 a.m. at Lenox Hill Hospital.

"The goal was to stabilize the spine, and that was achieved," said Dr. Elliott Hershman, the New York Jets' physician. "The long-term prognosis has not changed."

Byrd broke the fifth cervical vertebra when he collided with teammate Scott Mersereau while trying to make a tackle last Sunday. He has had no voluntary motion in his legs since then, although he does have some sensation in his legs.

"There was extensive damage," Hershman said.

Asked if Byrd might walk again someday, Hershman said, "That's very difficult to answer. I prefer to use the term we are hopeful."

He did say that it probably would be within two years that the ability to walk would return — if it ever does.

"We have to be strong for Dennis," Jets' coach Bruce Coslet said after wisely giving the players Monday and Tuesday off. "We're doing all we can, but we're helpless."

"Dennis is a fighter, a competitor, and what he would want us to do is get ready for Buffalo."

The Jets wonder how they will cope with it. How often will their focus stray during practice and games?

"Dennis will be on our minds for the rest of the season," said punter Louie Aguiar, one of Byrd's closest friends. "No matter what we're doing, we'll be wondering about him."

The Lord's Gaboon Vipers

I heard on National Public Radio the other day about religious folk in Georgia who get closer to the Lord by dancing with snakes.

They also drink strychnine mixed with water and speak in tongues.

I have seen this sort of spectacle and did not have to drive to Appalachia to see it, only into the snowed-over milo fields of Kansas and Nebraska.

A gun, setting aside all Freudian analysis, is still much like a rattlesnake. One end dispenses killing stuff.

The shooter very much doubts, determinedly pacing along the row, with snow whipping around her orange shooting jacket, that the killing end will be turned on her.

What force keeps a hunter from shooting herself or another, or her dog?

Good sense not to, is one force. A sense of right and wrong is another (bad to shoot dog, good to shoot bird).

Back to snakes. The Gaboon Viper of western Africa resembles an elephant's trunk, with fangs like steak knives. Teeth grow throughout a viper's life. When one has lived a long time, its freakish fangs puncture its lower lip. It bites itself to death.

Georgian snake handlers rarely handle Gaboon Vipers, or even large Copperheads. Church-goers have the sense to choose smaller snakes, such as the Massassauga, whose bite is survivable.

The Lord protects them. Or at least, their trance-like state removes from them the fear, which snakes smell and strike. The effect is the same. They get bit less often than hunters get shot.

If faith protects the holy, there must be something which protects the hunter. The game warden, although an inspiring figure, is only a uniform away from the parking-meter maid. And hunter-safety education classes are too unfocused to treat like Sunday school.

There are a billion cars, all speeding at one moment or other. Very few of them crash. Some tropical tourist busses veer off cliffs, but most do not.

The person who has hunted a long time either has a better chance of shooting herself by shooting more often, or a slimmer chance, due to expertise learnt over time. It's hard to say.

But the Gaboon Viper does dies from its own bite. Members of the Georgia Church of the Lord Jesus are carried out on stretchers. Uncles sometimes shoot nephews during snowstorms in pheasant season.

It happens today. It doesn't happen tomorrow. It may never happen again. It may always happen. Happening is dangerous. There's always a chance of gun failure, the barrel curling up like a pig's tail, the chest opening red like a lotus.

In Georgia, according to the radio, average Americans pull snakes out of cardboard boxes in sight of the cross, and dance, gibbering and shaking.

As at a prom, some of them stand along the wall and watch, sipping Salvation Cocktails, which are strychnine crossed with tap water. Then they go home. Some of them go hunting.

Pheasant, quail, and prairie chicken seasons end Jan. 31. Merry Christmas.

►BARTA NAMED SCHOLAR ATHLETE

Wildcat linebacker Brooks Barta was one of 24 scholar athletes named to the Hitachi/CFA Scholar-Athlete team announced Wednesday by the College Football Association. Barta, a senior in math education, currently has a 3.3 GPA and is leading the Cats in tackles for the fourth season.

►SAXTON ON GTE ACADEMIC TEAM

K-State senior spiker Kathy Saxton was named to the GTE District VII Academic All-District team announced today.

With this honor, the outside hitter is now on the national ballot for GTE Academic All-American. Saxton currently has a 3.5 GPA in accounting and is on the Academic All-Big Eight team.

►BARFIELD GOING TO JAPAN

TOKYO (AP) — Jesse Barfield is heading for Japan. Barfield led the American League in homers in 1986 when he hit 40 with the Toronto Blue Jays. He hasn't hit more than 28 since.

He will play with the Yomiuri Giants and will get about $1.7 million for a year in Japan.

NUTRITION

Food labels to be revised

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The White House unveiled food labeling rules Wednesday that for the first time will enable consumers to directly compare the nutritional value of every packaged food in the grocery store.

Labels on all processed foods will not only show calories, total fat, saturated fat, cholesterol, sodium, carbohydrates and protein, but will also put them all in the context of a recommended daily diet of 2,000 calories and 65 grams of fat.

Such designations as "low-fat," "high-fiber" and "light" will be based on federally imposed definitions. Serving sizes will be uniform.

Health and nutrition groups praised the decision, but a meat industry official said the labels would confuse people.

Currently, high-fat foods rarely carry nutrition information. Labels that do include such information often base it on varied serving sizes, and words used to describe food have no set meaning.

"To put it simply, the Tower of Babel in food labels has come down, and American consumers are the winners," said Health and Human Services Secretary Louis Sullivan.

"The gimmicks are gone," said Food and Drug Administration Commissioner David Kessler.

Agriculture Secretary Edward Madigan, who had opposed putting the sample diet on the labels, said he supported the decision and expected quick implementation of the rule.

Sullivan said food companies will likely begin putting the new labels on their foods next year, but won't be required to do so until May 1994.

He estimated the process of changing hundreds of thousands of labels would cost the industry about $2 billion.

"While we do not agree with each and every decision, we will now start the enormous job of providing this new information to consumers as soon as possible," said C. Manley Molpus, president and chief executive officer of the Grocery Manufacturers of America.

The labeling rules will not apply to restaurant menus, but any restaurant that posts a sign advertising a "low-fat" food must make sure the food complies with the government's definition.

Kessler and Sullivan had insisted in a dispute within the administration that packaged food labels include the chart that presents each nutrient as a percentage of a total daily diet.

The label will state explicitly that a serving of macaroni and cheese, for example, with 13 grams of fat, would comprise 30 percent of the total fat that someone on a 2,000 calorie diet should have for the day.

"If you see the number is 30 percent, that is relatively high in fat," said Kessler. "If it is 3 percent that is low in fat. It's that simple."

He and Sullivan said that the government will be conducting an extensive education campaign to help people use the labels.

The point, they said, is to enable consumers to better control their diets as a safeguard against chronic diseases. Health officials link fat with heart disease and some cancers. Sodium has been linked to high blood pressure.

Agriculture Secretary Madigan had fought against including the sample diet on the labels, saying it was complicated and didn't relate to anyone in particular.

The meat industry opposed the label, too. Meat is inherently high in fat and might seem undesirable to some people reading a label based on the diet of 2,000 calories and 65 grams of fat.

As a compromise, worked out by the White House, the label also includes a 2,500-calorie diet.

WHAT IT MEANS

Free — Less than five calories; less than 0.5 grams of sugar; less than 5 milligrams of sodium; less than 0.5 grams of fat; less than 2 milligrams of cholesterol and 2 grams of saturated fat per serving.

Low — Less than 140 milligrams of sodium; less than 40 calories; 3 grams or less of fat per serving.

High — Benefits the consumer by providing more than 20 percent of the amount recommended for daily eating, as in high-fiber.

Source of — Beneficial because it provides 10 to 19 percent of the amount of the nutrient recommended to be eaten each day.

Reduced or Less — Both mean at least 25 percent less than the original product in sodium, calories, fat, saturated fat or cholesterol.

Light — If a product has more than 50 percent calories from fat, light means at least a 50-percent reduction in fat. If it has less than 50 percent calories from fat, a product can be either 50 percent reduced in fat or have one-third less calories.

Light in Sodium — Reduces sodium of original product by 50 percent.

Rape workshop examines attitudes in popular culture condone this behavior." As part of the workshop, Davis handed out various pictures of women used in advertisements, this to foster reactions from workshop participants.

"Sex sells," said one student after looking at the pictures of barely dressed women.

After looking at the cover of an issue of Glamour magazine, Kelley Fink, Lafene Health Educator, said, "It seems if you bare more, you're sexier and prettier."

Davis pointed out the irony on the cover of Glamour. A skimpily dressed woman sat seductively on a beach, and the headline above the picture read, "1,400 Stories of Sexual Abuse."

"Not only do we prepare young women to be vulnerable, but we also give young boys mixed messages," Davis said. "This culture objectifies humans."

Davis said the magazine cover sends a mixed message because it reveals an inside article about sexual violence, but is contradicted by the "I'm ready" picture of the model.

"We are all complacent toward the exploitation of women," Davis said. "Our culture weds sex and violence."

Davis said she hopes to change Kansas rape statute with help from the Community Against Rape committee.

"We're researching to change the rape statute in Kansas. We can certainly do better than what we have now," Davis said.

The Women's Resource Center has started a Peer Rape Educator Program this semester.

"The program primarily brings awareness of rape through videos and statistics," said Carney, program coordinator.

She said using students for this program to reach other students is beneficial, because students will listen to their peers.

Davis said that besides rape being a sexual crime, it "brings violence to the soul, spirit and heart."

Art museum gets operating endowment

The museum was named for Marianna Kistler Beach after her husband, Ross, donated $2 million for the project.

Britt said the museum assessment plan, a plan that determined the spatial needs of the museum, had been finished, and the results sent to architects throughout the country.

K-State Art Collection curator Jessica Reichman said the response has been very positive.

"We are very pleased with the wide range of firms we've attracted," Reichman said.

"We have received qualifications reports from firms from the east and west coasts and from firms from Texas to South Dakota."

Britt said all proposals are being considered at this point.

"We are currently going through the review and hope to have the number of firms narrowed down to 15 by December 9," he said. "Those 15 will then submit their design proposals by Jan. 20."

He said these proposals will then be narrowed down to three to five firms, which will then be interviewed.

"The final selection will probably be sometime toward the end of February," Britt said.

"The architects will have about six months to finalize their plans.

The actual groundbreaking should be within a year if not sooner," he said.

The museum will be located in the southeast corner of campus behind Higinbotham Gate and will be big enough to house the entire K-State Art Collection, Reichman said.

"The museum will have about 33,000 square feet," she said. "This will be enough for the University collection of about 1,500 pieces with room to grow."

Total gifts and commitments to the museum currently exceed $3.9 million.

Mother-in-law's attraction creates problems for reader

YOU'RE ASKING ME?

by Cassandra Duveaux

DEAR CASSANDRA,

I'm having a serious problem. I've been living with a woman for over 2 years, and we are planning to get married. I really love her a lot.

My problem started about a month ago. Although I knew that my mother-in-law was really attracted to me, I never thought that she would push it to the extent that she did.

While visiting them at their house, we were by chance left alone one evening. This is nothing unusual, but this evening she went past her limits. She seduced me, and before I knew it we were in her and her husband's bed having passionate sex.

I feel extremely bad because I love my fiancée a lot, but I can't help but keep having sex with her mother. The sex I have with her far exceeds the love-making of my fiancée and I. She is filling a void in my life. I don't want to give up the love I share with my fiancée, but I just can't seem to give up my addiction. Please help me!

Addicted

DEAR ADDICTED,

Please do not place yourself in the category of having some physical addiction similar to those truly unfortunate people who are hooked on heroin or crack cocaine. You have actually made a choice (more than once) to go behind your fiancée's back and violate her trust by having intercourse (seduction or not) with her mother. One instance might possibly have elicited some modicum of sympathy, but your continued actions do not. I am well aware of sexual compulsives, and in my humble opinion, one instance, such as you described, does not place you in that category.

If you truly love your fiancée, you will break off the sideshow with her mother and seek counseling immediately. You have no idea the amount of potential emotional damage you have wrought on the one you supposedly love. I am afraid it is going to be more than either of you can handle.

DEAR CASSANDRA,

I am writing in response to your comments to Concerned and Very Upset (Nov. 16) regarding the abortion issue. It is a disgrace that a professor should give anything more than facts on abortion, regardless if he is "pro-choice" or "pro-life." The idea of being challenged for your beliefs about abortion by a professor is an idiosyncrasy. An instructor's duty is to instruct, not to present a biased opinion.

Furthermore, if the facts concerning abortion are presented morally, rationally, and scientifically, this professor, you, and others would understand that abortion is wrong. First, people need to accept the idea that killing the innocent is morally unacceptable. As George Washington warned in his farewell address, "Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports." We should stop denying the idea that immorality has no impact on the insensibility of abortion. By endorsing the legality of aborting the unborn, we as Americans, are doubting the bond between morality and a successful country.

Our Founding Fathers would no doubt be insulted to return to find the moral decay in America. They intended morality to support democracy. All would be outraged that professors express uneducated ideas and immoral values in the classroom. Our moral tradition is what made us a great democracy. Are we prepared to become an autocratic society?

As we abandon the rights of the unborn, we abandon our rights as moral beings.

J.A.S.

DEAR J.A.S.,

Most opinions are biased. It is, I believe, the basis for having an opinion. And I fail to understand your use of the word "idiosyncrasy." I am not sure what word you intended to use. In any event, I disagree with the thrust of your argument that a professor only has the "duty" to present the facts. That charge is certainly within their responsibilities, but they are entitled to their opinion and should be allowed to express it within the structure of the classroom, as long as it is identified as such. In fact, it would be a poor student that was not interested in hearing the "opinion" of his or her instructor on a relevant topic.

What I do understand from your comments, however, is your intolerance of the beliefs of others. You mention "morals" often enough (and religion in one instance) to make me wonder just whose "morals" and "religion" are we talking about (I think I already know). America is a country of many religions with many different moral systems. This is the problem that is created when we attempt to use religion or religious beliefs as the basis for applying a specific system of "moral values" to issues such as abortion. The thing that has kept our democracy great is we have managed to keep those who have the "right" religious beliefs from power.

You ask about "autocracy," when what you actually suggest in your discourse is a "theocracy." Either one is frightening.

UPC sponsors comedian for pre-finals laughs

JANET SATTERLEE

Collegian

K-State students looking for a study break can see comedian Mike Lewis perform as part of his Student Loan Tour.

Ernie Fields, Union Program Council member, said Lewis was selected by the UPC Eclectic Entertainment Committee after listening to one of his routines from a demo tape.

"We decided to bring him in now, right before finals, for students to get a little relaxation and laugh a little," Fields said.

Lewis has appeared on television shows such as "Comic Strip Live,"

"Comedy on the Road," "April Fool's Live" and "Comedy Gallery: The TV Show." He has also performed in clubs such as Improvisation and Comedy Gallery.

Fields said Lewis plays to the college crowd.

"His material is pretty college-oriented," he said.

In the past, Lewis performed at the University of Wisconsin, Mankato State University, the University of Minnesota, College of St. Thomas and Oakton Community College in Illinois.

"Lewis moves to the front rank of Minnesota's comics with his breathlessly funny set," said Colin

SHOWTIME

Covert of the Minneapolis Star Tribune. "His posture is that of a stogie-smoking connoisseur of machismo, but his braggadocio is too transparent to be offensive."

Lewis also has performed for corporations such as First Bank Systems, Northern Telecom and Syntex Laboratories.

"I think he will be really good," Fields said. "There's nothing better than live comedy."

COMEDY

Sinbad to bring his 'good, clean humor' to Bramlage

DAN GRAFEL

Collegian

Sinbad, movie and TV star, will bring his stand-up comedy routine to Bramlage Coliseum this weekend.

"It's good, clean humor," Bramlage Director Charlie Thomas said. "You could bring young children to the show."

Currently starring on NBC's "A Different World," Sinbad also appeared in "Necessary Roughness," his first feature film.

During his 1983 "Poverty Tour" he slept in bus stations and strangers' homes while performing at local clubs. It was during this tour that he got his first break with a "Star Search" audition.

Sinbad's first HBO comedy special, in January 1991, broke rating records for HBO.

This special, taped at Morehouse College, inspired Sinbad's "Share the Dream Tour" of historically black colleges.

Thomas said he got the idea to book Sinbad from members of the Black Student Union.

"We originally hoped to get him during Black History Week, but we were lucky enough to get B. B. King when Sinbad was not available," he said.

Thomas said he also would have liked to book Sinbad during Homecoming Week, but he was in New York hosting "Saturday Night Live."

Sinbad is also involved in humanitarian and community programs, including the Children's Defense Fund, Covenant House for Runaways and the Make-a-Wish Foundation.

Thomas said he is hoping for a turnout of at least 2,000 for the show.

He said he often books acts that he knows won't make a lot of money. Profits from big shows, like Garth Brooks, allow him to do that.

"In the overall balance, we've never had a year that didn't come out positive on non-athletic events," he said.

SINBAD

■ He will perform 8 p.m. Friday at Bramlage Coliseum. Tickets are $12.50 and $14.50 available at the Bramlage Box Office.

MUSIC SCENE

Vital Vinal to present blues great in series

MATT CUNNINGHAM

Collegian

The Vital Vinyl Blues Series is celebrating its first anniversary with a blues legend.

"It's the one year anniversary of doing shows, and I thought we would do a big show," said Mitch Ulrich, owner of Vital Vinyl.

Junior Wells, blues musician, has played with numerous greats.

He started out playing a harmonica with B.B. King when he was 11 or 12 years old and traveled with the Rolling Stones on their European Tour.

Wells can be described as "Muddy Water meets James Brown," Ulrich said.

Wells' performance brings in many different types of music. He is accompanied by his 9-piece band, which includes three horns.

"He goes from one sphere to another," Ulrich said. "Going from the blues of Muddy Waters to the funk of J. B. in one song."

Wells said in an interview with his hometown newspaper, the Chicago Tribune, "I'm trying to do more of my own stuff, but sometimes you have to do a variety of things because certain people will come in asking to do a Muddy Waters tune or little Walter."

A group of honored blues musicians have gotten together to play with this legend.

The opening band is Elmo and the All Stars, a collage of musicians from the Manhattan, Kansas City and Dallas areas. These musicians have known each other through the blues for years.

Dave Bailey, Elmo Bliss from Elmo and the All Stars, is honored at the chance to play with Wells.

"It's going to be an honor and real thrill to open for such a legend," Bailey said. "He's one of the icons of blues. It's a real honor to share the same stage."

LIVE BLUES

■ The show starts at 9:30 tonight at Snookie's Bar. Tickets are $6 in advance and $8 at the door.

asked to observe appropriate courtroom decorum. Miller instructed those wearing hats to remove them and to remain quiet and seated during the session.

Lewis served as presiding judge and had the lawyers give a brief background of each of the cases before argument. He told them they should keep the language more simple than they would in other sessions, so that the students could understand the proceedings.

Denney said the event was only a small part of an ongoing process.

"We have been discussing the cases for a long time," she said. "Today's process will be discussed, and then when the verdict comes through we will go over it as well."

She said she tries to get two big events per year for the classes to work on.

"The program is partly sponsored by the local bar association," she said. "Through their position, they are able to help us arrange some of this."

Lewis gave a history of the appellate court, saying the original court was in use at the turn of the century.

"We are the second incarnation of this process," he said. "Believe it or not, this saves the state over a million dollars in traveling costs, because the people don't have to make the haul to Topeka."

didn't want to seem one-sided," Rohrer said. "They really had no choice in the matter. If I were sponsoring a bowl game, I would have probably done the same."

Though Rohrer said his students didn't seem to be very disappointed, tuba player Bob Kimbrough, senior in secondary education said he felt band members had mixed feelings.

"It's kind of bad that it's during finals and all, but I would go," Kimbrough said. "When Mr. Rohrer said the athletic department told him the trip wasn't a possibility, we were bummed out. I know pretty much everybody would have jumped at that opportunity, because how often do you get to take a trip like that."

and said he expected it to be eventful.

"A lot of things that need to be done boil down to the fact that there are not sufficient funds to do them," Kitchings said.

He said he thought the month of February would bring a lot of awareness, but said he cautioned against confusing awareness with understanding.

"Understanding requires effort. Unless a person puts forth that effort, he's not going to understand," Kitchings said.

Franklin said awareness of other cultures is particularly important at K-State, where 80 percent of students are from Kansas — a state that is only 1 percent African-American.

"Most of our students have had little or no exposure to other cultures," he said.

Bill Arck, director of alcohol and other drug education services, said the goals of Alcohol Awareness Week were a lot like those of his office.

"We try to educate and talk about choice and responsible use," he said. "We certainly think Alcohol Awareness Week makes a difference or we wouldn't take all the energy, time and money to do it."

He said studies have been done before and after the week that show an increase in the knowledge of the effects of alcohol and drug use.

"It has proven to be successful, and a good example of that is the involvement of a major Fortune 500 company, Anheuser Busch," he said.

He said the company has helped the National Collegiate Alcohol Awareness Week by printing flyers and helping with other aspects of increased awareness.

to more than 1 million Somalis threatened by starvation. The Bush administration had offered up to 30,000 troops.

An international relief operation has been hamstrung by feuding Somali warlords and bandits in the lawless East African nation. The State Department says 1,000 people in Somalia are dying every day of starvation and disease. The death toll already exceeds 300,000.

The draft resolution is part of a compromise Washington is forging to win the support of China, which has threatened to veto a free-wheeling U.S.-led operation. African nations are also worried about U.S. domination of their continent.

In a sign of the deep rivalries in Somalia, two of the nation's leading warlords said they would boycott a U.N. conference in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia.

A conference spokesman gave no reason for the absence of Gen. Mohamed Farrah Aidid, who controls the southern half of Mogadishu, and Abdulrahman Tour, whose forces control much of the northern half of the country.

Eight other warlords have promised to attend the conference, which will review a 100-day aid program announced in early October. The United Nations had hoped to bring all Somali factions together as a step toward reconciliation.

groups across campus, McClaskey said. It proposes campus organizations be divided into service and non-service groups. Most college clubs will fall into the non-service group.

If the bill passes, service groups and college councils will be required to submit year-long budgets each spring. Non-service groups will be required to submit budgets itemized by projects each semester.

McClaskey said this may cause some controversy, because clubs and organizations will have to plan events far in advance in order to have money allocated to them. Also, Senate will have to add allocations in the fall, a process normally done only during the spring semesters.

More will be known about the changes in the process after Senate has a chance to read the bill and question the finance committee, she said.

A bill proposing the addition of new services in Holton Hall will also be heard during tonight's first readings.

Chairman of the Holton Hall Council, Tracy Mader, agriculture senator, said the Academic Career

Information Center (ACIC) is being established to help the University deal with the increasing number of students who have undeclared majors, change majors or are academically displaced.

Academically displaced students are those in good standing with the University, with at least a 2.2 grade point average, but who do not meet their college's academic requirements, Mader said.

ACIC will use the Discover program, which deals with career counseling. In spring, five stations will be available to all students, and by spring or fall 1994, 20 stations will be available, Mader said.

Mader said ACIC also plans to implement an Alumni Call Network. This program will allow students to reach alumni in their the current system is unfair.

"Let's say you're taking seven hours at Salina and decide you want to take a philosophy class where you would drive to Manhattan once a week," Rawson said. "You would have to pay an additional fee for those hours at a university you're already a student at. To me, that doesn't seem like a very seamless environment."

Though proposals are bringing certain areas together, Rawson said the K-State Police and Parking Services were separated.

The primary reason for the separation was that the campus police receive state funding, and Parking Services is financed only through the sale of permits and fines for parking violations, he said.

Rawson said an important change was making the assistant to the provost a full-time position.

"You'll find that K-State has one of the leanest administrations around in terms of cost as compared to other universities its size," Rawson said.

Rawson said the other major changes in administration include changing from a mainframe computer system to a UNIX system, and improving the work and living environments on campus.

Festive crowd helps light tree

Mayor's Holiday Tree helps kick off local food drive

KIM MCNITT
Collegian

Although the tree wasn't perfect — it actually leaned a bit to the right — the crowd was festive at the Mayor's Holiday Tree lighting ceremony Thursday night.

Manhattan mayor Rich Seidler lit the tree in Aggieville's Triangle Park to officially kick off a community-wide food drive. However, 79 percent of the goal has already been collected, Seidler said.

"Although solving hunger is an ongoing need in the city year-round, we give it a special focus in the holiday season," Seidler said.

The tree-lighting ceremony began with a performance by the K-State Choir.

In opening comments, Randy Martin, co-chairman of the holiday tree committee, said the goal was to "bring joy and happiness to some people in Manhattan who need some help."

Seidler said this time of year is especially hard for some people. Giving also seems to get people into the holiday spirit.

"The mayor's tree is a live tree for a reason," Seidler said. "To me, it's a symbol of how the community's spirit lives on throughout the year."

This is the sixth holiday tree, and each year, the amount of food to be raised continues to grow. This year's goal is 125,000 pounds, or 62 1/2 tons.

The mayor announced during the ceremony that 85,182 pounds have already been collected. Almost 50 percent of that has been raised on the K-State campus.

"The University community has just blown us away this year with its support," Seidler said.

Projects such as Cats for Cans and the 30 Days of Thanksgiving have contributed to the food

U.N. votes to send armed aid to Somalia

French, Belgian forces to join 28,000 U.S. troops

ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS — The United Nations launched the world's biggest armed humanitarian rescue Thursday night, sending a force led by 28,000 Americans to stop Somali bandits and help feed hundreds of thousands of starving people.

President Bush ordered U.S. forces to prepare for the trip. An announcement was expected after he consulted Friday with Congress.

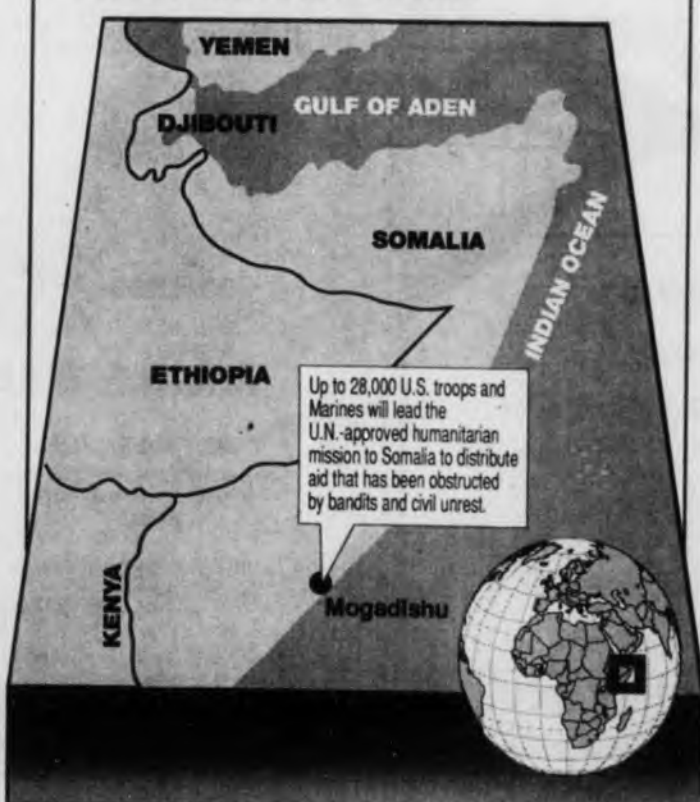

Once Bush gives the order, 1,800 troops aboard a three-ship strike force floating in the Indian Ocean could land on Somali beaches within hours, and the full force of 28,000 could arrive within weeks.

The 15-member U.N. Security Council, outraged by the plundering of relief aid destined for refugee camps filled with the dying, voted unanimously for the huge operation and asked other member states to contribute troops and money.

France was to send about 2,000 soldiers. Belgium and the African nations of Zimbabwe, Nigeria and Kenya also offered troops. Italy promised aid.

For all the boldness of the move, it came more than a year after severe food shortages and civil unrest were first reported in Somalia. And the Security Council mandate was vague: "to use all necessary means to create a secure environment for relief operations."

SAVING SOMALIA

SHANE KEYSER/Collegian

The resolution didn't say if that might mean creating some kind of U.N.-controlled civil government in chaotic Somalia, or whether the troops would try to disarm bandits and militiamen. It said nothing about who would pay for the operation or how long it would last.

"No longer than is necessary,"

U.S. Ambassador Edward Perkins said, adding that troops would steer away from political interference.

"It is for the Somali people to decide their own future," he said.

Somalia, a country with no functioning government, was represented at the meeting by Fatun

CAMPUS

Campus in compliance with disabilities act

MEGAN MULLIKIN
Collegian

K-State is taking steps to follow the Americans with Disabilities Act.

Title II of the act, which went into effect July 26, 1991, states that state and local government services may not discriminate on the basis of disability. This requires universities "to operate each service, program or activity so that it is readily accessible to individuals with disabilities."

Ed Rice, assistant vice president for K-State's Division of Facilities, said K-State can be considered up to code under Title II on everything because changes can be made to provide for any disabled person.

Mark Taussig, landscape architect for facilities, served on a committee that surveyed the campus checking for necessary changes. Taussig said to reach the requirement in Title II, all programs, activities and services must be accessible to everyone on campus.

"You can relocate when it is needed. It is just as long as we have reasonable accommodations," he said.

All new buildings on campus are meeting the codes, Rice said, but it is difficult to get older buildings completely up to code. If a building needs a specific wheelchair ramp or other accommodations, facilities can provide it, he said.

A $10-million fund for rehabilitation and repair projects is available to all Kansas Board of Regents schools, and K-State gets a portion, said Tom Rawson, vice president for administration and finance.

Rawson said K-State received $2.7 million this year. Sidewalks, elevators and restrooms are among the facilities slated for improvements.

"Our No. 1 priority in the budget

KSU students are Truman finalists

3 K-Staters now wait until January to advance further

LISA COLE
Collegian

Three K-State students have been chosen as finalists in the Truman Scholarship competition.

The finalists plan careers in the areas of public health, international development and advocacy for Latin American issues.

Scott Wissman, senior in Spanish and pre-medicine, Charles Walters, junior in political science, history and international studies, and Ian Bautista, senior in Spanish, political science and Latin American studies, were nominated for the Truman Scholarship last spring.

They all said they have big plans for the scholarship if they receive it.

"We've spent the last month vigorously writing and rewriting our applications," Walters said.

Wissman said he is planning to practice medicine in an underserved Hispanic community or a public health clinic.

"I've been looking at medical schools," he said. "I would like to try for a masters in public health as well as my medical degree."

Wissman said he is considering medical schools at the University of Kansas, Brown University or the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. He said he is interested in working for the U.S. Public Health Service or the World Health Organization.

Walters is planning to work with the U.S. Agency for International Development or the United Nations Development Program.

Walters said he would eventually like to obtain the position of either director of the Agency for International Development or United States Secretary of State.

"What I would like to do is to bring to the world stage a new perspective in which we strive toward mutually beneficial world trade policies between the United States and third world countries," Walters said.

Walters said he would use the Truman scholarship to obtain a master's degree in development management.

"There are two graduate programs I'm interested in. One is at the American University Institute for Developmental Studies. The other choice I considered is the Harvard University Social Change and International Development Program," he said.

Bautista said he plans to work as an advocate for Latino issues. He said he would like a position with the Department of Labor and Immigration, the Immigration

STUDENT GOVERNMENT

Senate hears bill to establish student V.P.

TED KADAU JR.
Collegian

K-State could have a student vice president as early as next spring.

Student Governing Association heard first reading on a bill at its meeting Thursday night to create the position. The bill will be voted on next week, and it will require a three-fourth majority voting in favor.

It was inaccurately reported in Thursday's Collegian that Senate would not meet next week.

If passed by Senate, the bill would then go to the nine college councils. At least seven would have to give approval for the bill to become reality.

Mike Porter, attorney general and the bill's sponsor, said the bill is to provide both an efficient and more representative way of presidential succession.

"(We need) to give students more say in the executive branch," he said.

Currently, should the student body president be unable to fulfill her or his duties, the successor would not be student-elected.

"The successor should be someone the students have elected,"

NEWS DIGEST

CLINTON PICKS MISSOURIANS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — Three Missourians, including Gov.-elect Mel Carnahan, have been chosen for the transition team of President-elect Bill Clinton.

Also picked were Kansas City Mayor Emanuel Cleaver and Joyce Aboussie, a top aide to U.S. House Majority Leader Richard Gephardt, a St. Louis Democrat.

All have been asked to sit in a committee to plan the January inauguration and help set the new administration in motion. Carnahan, who is lieutenant governor, was among the first Democratic leaders to endorse Clinton, and Cleaver campaigned for him in several cities.

OIL THREATENS SPAIN SHORE

LA CORUNA, Spain (AP) — A tanker crashed onto rocks outside a fog-shrouded harbor entrance Thursday, spilling millions of gallons of crude oil that threatened the area's rich fishing grounds.

Hundreds of people fled their homes after an explosion tore the stern loose and set off an inferno only a few yards offshore, five hours after the ship ran aground. All 29 crew members were rescued from the Greek ship, officials said.

Authorities said an oil slick up to a mile wide stretched 12 miles up the coast of Galicia, as the region is known. The tanker was carrying an estimated 23 million gallons of crude oil.

CORRECTION

In the Nov. 23 Collegian, a word was left out of Lannie Zweimiller's guest column about HIV testing at Lafene Health Center. It should have read "between 300 and 400 students visit the center every week day during the fall/spring semester," rather than "every week."

The Collegian regrets the error.

'Nutcracker' treats young, old

Tulsa Ballet creates magic with Yuletide story

CHRISTINA CARBAJAL

Collegian

Both adults and children filled McCain Auditorium Thursday night for Tulsa Ballet Theatre's production of "The Nutcracker."

Children's giggles and adults' smiles could be seen and heard throughout the excellently produced ballet.

"The Nutcracker" story opens with a Christmas Eve party, at the house of a German family, Silberhaus. The Silberhaus children, Clara and Fritz, play dancing games with their friends and enjoy their gifts, while the parents dance elegantly and sedately to their own music.

The dancers' costumes in this scene each had separate colors of bright peach, mint green, lavender and blue, which lit up the stage. Along with the costumes, the dancers' energy and joy created the perfect atmosphere for Christmas.

The Christmas magic begins when one of the children's godfather, the mysterious Dr. Drosselmeyer, arrives. A hobbling old man, the doctor brings life-sized mechanical figures to entertain the adults and children. The figures include dolls, poodles and soldiers who dance in their own styles with the turning of an oversized wind-up key. The poodle dancers move with dog-like actions, and the soldier dancers convey serious faces and jerky body movements.

Clara then receives a small Nutcracker doll, which eventually comes to life at midnight, when everyone has gone to bed. Clara watches as he becomes a handsome prince, who, along with his toy soldiers, helps fight off the seven-headed Mouse King and his troop of mice.

played the toy soldiers and the mice that made up the scene's highlights.

Next, the prince takes Clara away on a journey through the Forest of Christmas, where the Snow Queen, Snow King and snowflakes perform for them. Dressed in glittering white costumes, the dancers glided gracefully around the stage in a snow dance until snow began to fall.

The Kingdom of the Sweets is the next stop for Clara, who is the guest of honor at a grand party.

She is offered things to eat and drink from different lands, including hot chocolate from Spain, coffee from the Orient and tea from China. The dancing beverages had colorful ethnic costumes, and excellently demonstrated each of their country's dance moves.

The most striking scene was the Waltz of the Flowers. The dancers' costumes transformed the stage into a sea of rose and pink. The flower dancers delicately floated to the music, captivating Clara with their movements.

Other highlights included the Dew Drop Fairy and her Cavalier, who beautifully performed together. The other pair of dancers, the Grand Pas de Deux, matched the others with their own expressive movements.

Overall, the ballet dancers performed with outstanding movements and choreography, which helped create a magical Christmas atmosphere. Anyone, especially children, who sees this version of the ballet will not leave disappointed.

MUSIC

Diligent decade closes the circle

After performing for 14 years, singer returns to area

TED KADAU JR.

Collegian

After a full decade of diligence in his art, Todd Newman has come full circle.

His music has echoed from the streets of Minneapolis to the brothels of Mexico, all in his "power pop" style, influenced by 1970s' greats such as the "Wings" and "Big Star."

Newman, who until recently strummed guitar and sang lead vocals for the now defunct Twin/Tone label band the Leatherwoods, is now 30 years old, and the years have left him with mixed feelings.

"I started playing in bars when I was 16, so in actuality I've been performing for about fourteen years. I honestly can't do anything else," he said.

In truth, Newman doesn't want to do anything else.

"I've got about a semester left to get a degree in English, but why? That would just qualify me to work at the Sub & Stuff around the corner," Newman said.

After a stint in an old Lawrence band known as the "Lions and Dogs," the guitarist/vocalist spent time in a Topeka cover band doing gigs in some less than savory establishments.

"For 14 days in a row, seven days a week, we played in this strip bar. It was actually pretty cool, I can remember this mother and daughter team. They had all these tattoos and were missing about half their teeth," he said. "The bar itself was pretty countrified, and the owner said we were too loud. The strippers were nice, though."

After a time with this lineup, Newman and a friend sold their worldly possessions and took their show on the road to Minneapolis. There they spent a month living in Newman's car, trying to break into the Twin City music scene.

After coaxing a Topeka friend to come to Minneapolis to play drums, the trio found a successful niche. It was at this time that the now infamous Mexico era came into being.

"We played for about a month at the Mexican resort where they filmed the movie '10.' It was pretty grueling," he said.

During this excursion, he once again found himself in a den of ill-repute when the band was hired to do a show in a Mexican brothel.

After a month in Mexico, the band returned to Minneapolis to record the Leatherwoods' latest and last album, the critically acclaimed

"Topeka Oratorio." A big surprise came when they learned they would be recording with Paul Westerberg, former frontman for the pioneer grunge band the Replacements.

"Paul was a very nice guy. It was funny, because we got drunk with him that last night before he decided to clean up," Newman said, referring to Westerberg's decision to stop drinking.

"We started out to do a few songs and ended up doing an entire album that took over a year and a half to record."

After recording the album, the Leatherwoods disbanded for reasons he summarized as "all that rock-n-roll crap."

With this change, Newman moved back to Lawrence last September, following the July release of the album.

Since September, he has spent his time relaxing around the Lawrence area.

"I've just been hanging out lately, playing pickup with different bands."

"I started playing in bars when I was 16, so in actuality I've been performing for about fourteen years. I honestly can't do anything else."

DECEMBER 4, 1992

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

IN OUR OPINION

By the Collegian Editorial Board

The Wildcats take it to Tokyo

THE ISSUE

The K-State football team will be playing Nebraska in Tokyo on Saturday.

The K-State-Nebraska games haven't been anticipated much by the Wildcats in recent years.

But this year, the game is being played in Tokyo. The players are looking forward to Saturday's match and will remember it, no matter which team wins.

Playing in the Tokyo Dome will be a positive experience for several reasons.

K-State is going to make big bucks — $400,000, to be exact, for moving the game from Manhattan to Tokyo.

But even more valid will be the chance for the players to experience a different culture firsthand. For many of the players, it is the first and maybe last time in their lives they'll go to Japan.

Coaches have stressed out over playing in Tokyo. But it will be more of an educational trip to the players than the mere chance itself to play overseas.

The Wildcats' preparation for the journey to the Far East started long before game day.

In order to learn about Japanese culture and history, most players took a one-credit hour class about Japan this semester. The Cats also learned practical things, such as eating with chopsticks and singing the K-State fight song in Japanese.

During their stay in Tokyo, the players are scheduled to take several sightseeing bus tours in the city besides their daily practices.

The football team has the one-time opportunity to play the role of the international ambassador. Being well-prepared for the trip is as important as playing well in the game, representing K-State in the best light in Tokyo.

Good luck.

Society's problems don't start in womb

Editor,

Thank you for writing "Murder problem has answers" in the Dec. 3 Collegian, in which you suggested that "We need to educate our children in the home and school to have respect for all human life."

When children grow up in a society that looks upon those who are still in the womb as "problems" that need to be eliminated, it is only natural that they will come to see others as problems that need to be eliminated, instead of as people who need to be loved.

► HARASSMENT

Letter reflects anger, confusion over event

Editor,

Please allow me to share with you a letter recently written by a K-State student. The student wrote in response to an event that happened last month. The letter could not be published as he submitted it, because he was not willing to sign his name.

Because I understand the student's desire to remain anonymous, I have agreed to re-submit his letter above my signature.

Editor,

I would like to share with you and your readers a most interesting and distasteful experience that was thrust upon me recently in the K-State Union. While using what I thought was the basement level restroom, I noticed something interesting going on in the stall next to me. First, I witnessed self-indulgence, which if you wish to be frank, is less distressing than what happened next.

From between the wall and the divider four fingers appeared in my stall. They wiggled and moved up and down along the divider only inches from my head. I half hoped it was a purposeless activity, and moreover that it was not intended to involve me. Despite the finger show, I remained calm and silent. But that ain't all, folks.

From beneath the divider I saw two knees hit the floor and a male organ appeared half into my stall. Now remember, I am in no position to go storming next door and ask my new neighbor to keep his limbs to himself. At this point I felt both furious, and to some degree, violated. If I could ever begin to empathize with a woman who has been harassed, or sexually accosted for that matter, it was right then and there.

After the organ withdrew itself from my stall my neighbor dressed himself and prepared what would be his final assault.

He left his stall and began pushing on my stall door and looking in at me, while whispering, "What would you like?" I have to admit, this rattled me. I was speechless. The only sounds I could make out were "excuse me, uh, this stall is taken." He then pushed on the door a couple more times and eventually left.

I write this because frankly I am angry and offended. I can only imagine how difficult it must be to find gay companions if these are the lengths to which someone must go to be satisfied. This is meant with no offense toward any member of the gay community, nor toward the community as a whole. But I am concerned about the message this type of public display of indecency sends to the larger population.

If I am to respect an individual's right to privacy concerning with whom they choose to have sex, then the same should be true of that same individual's observation of my right to use restroom facilities in private.

To the frisky gentleman in the stall next door: The next guy you expose yourself to might not be as understanding as I.

I urge readers of the student's letter not to assume that these are the actions of any particular population but rather are the bizarre behavior of a very disturbed individual. This type of behavior is abhorrent to all regardless of sexual orientation.

In response to this student's letter and the earlier account of the "Tea Room" activities, our office is meeting with University officials to devise a plan to address this problem.

Susan Scott
Associate dean of student life

► BIRTH CONTROL

Column, letters don't mention parental role

Editor,

This letter is in response to the column in the Dec. 1 Collegian about Mid-America High and the response letters in the Dec. 2 paper. I am a mother of two children. As parents, we feel that it is our responsibility to teach them self-respect. The writers did not include a conversation with a teenager who chose not to have sex and felt good about it.

Robert Hackney stated, "that teens are going to have sex before marriage." In other words, "I should not try to teach my children good moral values, they are going to have sex anyway."

Where are the parents of these teens? I pray to God every day to give us guidance with our children and to give them the armor they need to go out into the world. Maybe we need a little more family involvement and a little less school.

TOLES

Presenting the boogymen of finals week

DAVID FILIPPI

If it can go wrong, it usually will, especially at the very worst time

Have you ever felt like somebody's out to get you? No, not your parents or your instructors. I'm talking about a "boogymen," something evil and unpredictable.

As we cruise in the direction of finals week, this ruthless, unseen enemy tends to rear its ugly head when we least expect it. To what am I referring?

This is the story of my first encounter with the boogymen at K-State. It's a true story, and it happened right on the edge of finals week, some five years ago.

I was tired and aching with discomfort. After a long night of cramming and two short hours of shut-eye, I had every right to proclaim that dorm cots were not the Cadillacs of Posturepedic comfort.

Nevertheless, I had class, and, by golly, I was going to make it on time. I grabbed my towel and hurried off to the showers.

Some time later I was awake, and it wasn't until the trip back to my dorm room that it suddenly struck me — the worst of all horrors — I had locked myself out of my room.

"No biggie," I said to myself. My roommate would still be there to let me in. When I reached the door, I knocked and waited ... and waited ... and waited

My roommate had already left for breakfast.

So there I was, standing in my towel with nothing to keep me company but a bar of Zest, five floors up in Goodnow Hall.

The boogymen had struck. Obviously, this was not going to be my day.

I headed for the resident assistant's room down the hall. He, too, had vanished into thin air.

Finally, after 30 minutes of a frustrated fury, I remembered — I had left my key in the shower.

Looking back now, I can laugh. It's funny because I know I'm not alone. Everybody has had experiences similar to this.

Perhaps you've felt the presence of the boogymen, some force working against you, some principle of fate.

Some call it Murphy's Law. Put bluntly, it states: "If anything can go wrong, it will."

You know what I'm talking about. The instant you sit down on the toilet, the phone rings. Or as soon as you get settled down to bask in the rays of a warm summer day, the sky clouds over.

It always seems to rain as soon as you finish waxing your car and always stops raining as soon as you find your umbrella.

But in actuality, Murphy's Law really doesn't mean that much. It's true that there are a lot of things we can't control, like the weather, the phone or the twisted logic in John Hart's columns.

But we can control how we respond to such incidents. More times than not, we respond irrationally to one unfortunate incident, which in turn may ruin the rest of our day. Or maybe our whole week.

One negative experience builds to the next, setting us up for a whole series of downfalls.

The underlying point is this: We are responsible for the creation and continuance of Murphy's Law. As soon as something beyond our control gets fouled up, we psychologically prepare for the next foul-up; only this time, it may be an incident we can control.

Why does it matter now, a week before finals? Well, if under the pressure of finals you screw up the first one, don't let it get you down. You probably have a slew of four or five more.

Back to my story. You can probably guess what happened to me the rest of the day. It turned out to be one of the worst days of my life.

In my frenzy to make it to class on time, I somehow forgot my assignment. It was only on the second time to class that I realized it was Wednesday, not Thursday, and my class wasn't until the next morning.

I spilled milk on my lap at breakfast, lost my glasses and flunked a quiz.

I had begun the day thinking, "This was not going to be a good day," and it wasn't.

The moral of my story: Don't let the boogymen get you.

Strong 2nd half leads Lady Cats to victory

K-State overcomes halftime deficit to beat Northern Iowa, 61-55

TONYA FOSTER
Collegian

The Lady Cats turned their game around early in the second half to come from behind, defeating Northern Iowa 61-55 Thursday night at Bramlage Coliseum.

"We fought hard — we thought and fought," K-State coach Susan Yow said of her team, now 2-0 this season. "We're still trying to find our identity."

Yow said she felt the game was more emotional for Northern Iowa.

"I felt Northern Iowa came out with much emotion. I think we were flat in the first half."

K-State trailed the Panthers at halftime, 27-25.

Senior guard Kelly Moylan said the team still needs to put two good halves together. Junior guard Andrea O'Neal agreed.

"We need to come in and establish the team at the beginning," she said.

Moylan set up to surge ahead for K-State with her second 3-point field goal to tie the score at 37 five minutes into the second half.

"I've worked hard to make them all. I get fired up when I shoot them," Moylan said.

Then, senior forward Leah Honeycutt pushed the Lady Cats ahead by hitting back-to-back shots, giving her team a 41-37 lead.

Yow said players of both teams started to feel the game in their legs toward the end of the game. Yow decided to get her back-up team in the game to give the starters a rest. But Northern Iowa, trailing the Lady Cats, couldn't afford to take its starters out of the game.

"After we made our surge, we put in our white unit. That was a key factor," Yow said.

"We're learning as we go along," Honeycutt said. "When we'd have a five-, six-point lead, they'd knock us down to a three-, four-point lead. So we needed to keep our leads."

And that's what they did.

Honeycutt was the top scorer of the game with 22 points. The senior forward also pulled down nine rebounds, dished out three assists, blocked one Panther shot and recorded a pair of steals.

Moylan and sophomore Shanelle Stires both had 10 points. O'Neal added nine points, and junior Pam Holzman hit the basket for six.

The Lady Cats turned the ball over 25 times. Both O'Neal and sophomore forward JoMoree Grattan had five turnovers.

K-State, led by Honeycutt's and forward Pam Stoltz' nine boards, outrebounded UNI 46-34.

Saturday, the Lady Cats will try to improve to 3-0 when they take on the Leopards of Lafayette College at 5 p.m. at Bramlage Coliseum. The game will be played immediately prior to the men's game.

"Lafayette won 18 games last season, but they lost some starters," Yow said. "It's a game we can execute well."

The Leopards defeated Towson State Thursday 66-57 and are 2-0 in the season. The team is led by 6-foot, 1-inch junior center Chris Sieling, who averaged 22 points in the last two games. Junior guard Heidi Caruso has averaged 16.5 points, and 5'11" junior forward Angela Spell has averaged 10.5 points.

Wildcats to take on Cornhuskers in Tokyo

STEVE ROCK
Collegian

Who said K-State isn't going to a bowl game?

The Wildcat football team wraps up its 1992 season with a home game in Tokyo against the 11th-ranked Nebraska Cornhuskers in a game dubbed the Coca-Cola Bowl.

"In addition to providing the education opportunities, the intent was that K-State hasn't been to many bowl games," K-State coach Bill Snyder said.

"Consequently, I wanted to provide an opportunity for them to experience that type of atmosphere and hopefully whet their appetites a little bit."

The contest, to be played at 1 p.m. Sunday Tokyo time (10 p.m. Saturday CST) will be a chance for the Huskers, 8-2, to clinch a first-place finish in the Big Eight and a trip to the Orange Bowl.

For the 5-5 Cats, it's a chance to finish with successive winning seasons for the first time since 1953-54 and play a bowl game of their own.

"We're looking at it like our postseason game," Wildcat linebacker Brent Venables said. "Everyone else gets to go to Hawaii or Miami — they're all staying in the states."

"But we get to go overseas for our postseason bowl game. That's really exciting."

Preparing for the season finale was more than just watching tapes and running drills — for the 1992 finale, the Cats had to learn about Japanese culture.

The players did just that with a one-hour class and a Japanese meal in which the players got to experiment with chopsticks and sushi.

"I prefer American food," Venables said. "Not to take anything away from it — I'm just not used to it."

But can he use the chopsticks? "No, I can't. I'm not that coordinated — I'm a linebacker."

The game will be played in the Tokyo Dome, which seats 50,000 fans. Spectators will be handed either a purple or red pompon as they enter the stadium, thus determining whether they root for the Huskers or the Cats.

The game pits the nation's 10th-ranked offensive team, the Huskers, against the nation's 106th-ranked offensive team, the Cats.

That Nebraska offense suffered somewhat of a blow in last week's 33-9 victory over the Oklahoma Sooners — the injury of the Big Eight Player of the Year, Derek Brown.

Brown, who had been averaging more than 101 yards per game, dislocated a shoulder and will be out for at least four weeks.

But Brown's mate in the Husker backfield, sophomore Calvin Jones, leads the Big Eight with a 102-yard per-game average.

He has scored 13 touchdowns and is threatening to be the first player since Mike Rozier, 1982-83, to lead the conference in scoring for two consecutive seasons.

Between Jones and Brown, the "we-backs" — Nebraska's variation of the I-back offense — the Huskers are averaging 332 rushing yards per game, tops in the nation.

The Cats are coming off a 10-0 victory over Oklahoma State, a game in which the K-State defense took over and virtually won the game. That Cat defense registered four interceptions, two fumble recoveries and a blocked field goal to post its second shutout of the season.

Although the game in Japan gives the Wildcats several cultural opportunities, the players seem to have kept perspective on what the game means.

"We're going into this game looking for a win," Venables said. "We're not just going to see the sights of Japan — we're going to play a football game, and everything else that comes is just an added plus."

But the game does, indeed, offer something more than just a football game for the coaching staff.

"I'm trying to get us into the sumo stables where the sumo wrestlers are, and I'll certainly check eligibility there," Snyder said.

The game will not be televised, but the Wildcat radio network, WIBW-AM 580, will carry the game live following coverage of the men's basketball game.

Financially, the trip to Japan makes cents

FRANK KLEEMANN
Collegian

The Wildcats' sweat in the game against the Nebraska Cornhuskers Saturday in Tokyo will generate a good paycheck for K-State.

The Department of Intercollegiate Athletics will receive $400,000 for playing at the Coca-Cola Bowl at the Tokyo Dome, senior associate director Jim Epps said.

Sponsored through several companies, Tele Planning International Inc., organizer of the bowl, provides the school with free air fare for 150 persons, hotel rooms, meals and ground transportation in Tokyo.

K-State's travel company consists of 153 people, Epps said. Besides 83 players and the coaching staff including team managers and film people, several University administrators, spouses and 14 cheerleaders traveled to Tokyo Tuesday.

K-Staters will return Dec. 7. Nebraska receives the same free arrangements for the Tokyo trip as K-State. However, Nebraska is only guaranteed $200,000.

Nebraska's assistant athletic director for business and finance, Gary Fouraker, said Nebraska does not mind to make only half of the money as K-State does.

"It's K-State's home game.

They're the team that moves its home status," he said. "We get more than we would playing in Manhattan."

The Cornhuskers have a similar travel company of K-State's, including 88 players and 10 cheerleaders.

The game, in which Nebraska is looking to qualify for the Orange Bowl by beating K-State, is televised throughout Japan. But Wildcats fans wanting to watch the televised game are out of luck. The TV rights are exclusively in Japan.

The athletic department made the attempt to set up a big screen in Bramlage Coliseum to show the game via satellite after the K-State-Lafayette basketball game Saturday night.

Epps said he isn't an expert about the technical aspects of the process, but he said K-State couldn't pick up the coordinates on its dishes.

However, K-State fans can still listen to the game live on radio.

"WIBW will broadcast the game from Tokyo," Epps said.

Mitch Holthus, Voice of the Wildcats, will be the play-by-play announcer, assisted by color analyst Stan Weber.

The football broadcast will start after the Wildcats basketball game around 9:30 p.m. with the pre-game show. The game itself will be at 10 p.m.

K-State will make $400,000 playing in Japan's Coca-Cola Bowl.

Track and field team to be off and running

K-State will be the host of the KSU Allcomers indoor track meet Saturday at Ahearn Field House.

The field events start at 10 a.m., and track events begin at 11:30 a.m.

"It is a very low-key meet, but I'm personally anxious to see what we have accomplished," track coach Cliff Rovelto said.

Rovelto said the meet participants will largely be unattached to universities. He said most are from community colleges, whose seasons do not start until spring semester.

The athletes must compete individually rather than with a team.

Park College will participate in the meet, Rovelto said.

"I'm anxious to see the sprinters on the women's team," he said.

Rovelto said the athletes can qualify for the national track and field indoor meet. He said all sprinters, jumpers, throwers and multi-event athletes will compete, but no distance runners.

"They've done a good job training," Rovelto said. "I know it will be an impressive performance."

The first event will be the women's long jump, followed by the men's.

The one-mile run will be the first track event.

Little-known Lafayette next challenge for Cats

STEVE ROCK
Collegian

Perhaps one of the few things K-State has in common with Ivy League schools Princeton and Yale is that the Lafayette Panthers fall on their men's basketball schedules, too.

Indeed, the 1-0 Cats face Lafayette at 7:30 p.m. Saturday in Bramlage Coliseum. The Panthers, 0-2, lost to Princeton 65-48 in their season opener, a game in which none of their players scored in double figures, and Yale 53-42 Thursday night.

Lafayette College, in Easton, Pa., has an enrollment of 2,000. A year ago, the Panthers finished 8-20 and sixth in the Patriot League Conference.

The Wildcats are coming off their ninth straight season-opening victory, an 85-61 win against the Coppin State Eagles.

"You have to win all of your non-conference games," said K-State guard Brian Henson, who led the Cats with 18 points against the Eagles. "And it's important to win all the home games."

In Tuesday's victory, five Cats scored in double figures, and eight players were in the game for 10 minutes or more. And Cat coach Dana Altman said he was pleased with what the team accomplished in the first game of the season.

"This whole month, we have to learn a lot," he said. "We have to develop a lot."

And the Cats, he said, have taken the first step.

In that first step, K-State shot 58 percent from the floor and 65 percent from 3-point range. And the 11 3-pointers were one shy of the school record.

But Altman said the Cats need more production under the basket.

"We want to get the ball down low and maybe get that defense to drop in a little bit. We're not going to be able to live on that perimeter shot all year," he said.

"We need to get the ball to the baseline and give those guys an opportunity to score."

Junior forward Deryl Cunningham scored 11 points down low for the Cats, making five of his eight shots and pulling down six offensive rebounds.

Transfer Ron Lucas, also a junior forward, connected on four of his six shots underneath and scored eight points in just 16 minutes.

And freshman Jerrell Roberson, at 6-foot-9 the tallest Wildcat, made his presence known despite playing just 10 minutes. He was whistled for goaltending twice, was called for a foul three times and fired up the crowd once.

With less than eight minutes to play in the first half, Roberson made a basket and was fouled, giving him a 3-point opportunity. He pumped his fist emphatically, putting the crowd in an uproar.

"He's excited about playing," Altman said of Roberson. "He wants to play. But he had three fouls in those 10 minutes, and I was afraid to play him any longer."

"I wasn't afraid he was going to hurt someone from their team — I was worried about him running into one of our guys."

Tuesday's victory was witnessed by 5,412 fans, the smallest opening crowd in Bramlage Coliseum history.

"I was disappointed," Henson said. "But I think we're going to have to prove ourselves."

"But it's going to fill up."

Chiefs' coach not worried about the Juice's remarks

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — O.J. Simpson can comment on the Kansas City Chiefs offense all he wants, and Marty Schottenheimer will keep coaching it.

Schottenheimer, the Kansas City coach, brushed off criticism by Simpson, who said on the NBC halftime show Sunday that the Chiefs' offense was unimaginative.

Simpson said the Chiefs never would reach the Super Bowl with Schottenheimer's offense.

"They don't pay me to be imaginative," Schottenheimer told a room of broadcast reporters that also included Kansas City general manager Carl Peterson. "They don't pay me to be creative. They pay me to win."

"They pay O.J. to talk about things like this."

The Chiefs' run-oriented offense has come under criticism before. Bill Walsh, CBS commentator last year, had virtually the same thing to say as Simpson did this year.

Chiefs' fans also have been critical of the offense on radio call-in shows.

Schottenheimer is a firm believer that the running game must be established. He has built the Chiefs around a huge offensive line, and he has bruising running backs in Barry Word and Christian Okoye and a speedier back in Harvey Williams.

He acknowledged the Chiefs' offense is predictable. A series starts with a running play between the tackles virtually every time, and he said he prefers to always run on second down as well.

"I don't want to have a third and long," Schottenheimer said. "I'd much rather have third and five or third and four."

This year, Kansas City signed quarterback Dave Krieg in Plan B to replace Steve DeBerg, mostly to improve the downfield passing attack.

But the offense still is centered on running plays and short play-action passes.

He later engaged in a philosophical discussion with another reporter who contended that opponents who know Kansas City is going to run 80 percent of the time in particular situations can better prepare their defense.

Schottenheimer maintained that a team with better players will win even when the other team knows what is coming.

"Play-calling is overrated," he said. "If your people know what to do, and they do it fundamentally sound, you're going to win. That's what coaching is all about."

Schottenheimer and his Chiefs, 8-4 and in first place of the AFC West, take on the Los Angeles Raiders, 5-7, at 3 p.m. Sunday in the Los Angeles Coliseum.

The Chiefs beat the Raiders earlier this season 27-7 at Arrowhead Stadium.

Saints clinch playoff berth

Five field goals lift New Orleans to 22-14 victory against Atlanta

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW ORLEANS — The New Orleans Saints became the second team to clinch a spot in the NFL playoffs, beating the Atlanta Falcons 22-14 Thursday night behind five field goals by Morten Andersen and an interception return by cornerback Toi Cook.

New Orleans (10-3) joined the San Francisco 49ers (10-2) as the second NFL West team to clinch playoff spot.

Deion Sanders had six kickoff returns for 190 yards for the Falcons (5-8). He also went 55 yards with a lateral following an interception.

"He's so fast, so jittery, he's hard to bring down," Andersen said. "I was surprised he'd bring them out from so deep in the end zone. It's a little frustrating when you think you had a good kickoff and it goes into the end zone and he brings it out to the 45."

Saints' quarterback Bobby Hebert completed 20 of 29 passes for 244 yards and a touchdown. Falcons quarterbacks Billy Joe Tolliver and Wade Wilson passed for a total of 126 yards.

Atlanta took a 14-12 lead on Wilson's 13-yard touchdown pass to Michael Haynes with 4:25 remaining. The score was set up by Sanders' 60-yard kickoff return.

The Saints went ahead 15-14 on Andersen's fifth field goal, a 37-yarder with 1:56 to go after a 51-yard, nine-play drive. Cook then sealed the win when he returned an interception 48 yards for a touchdown.

New Orleans began the game with a 72-yard, 17-play drive that took 11:27. The Saints stalled at the 2 and Andersen kicked a 20-yarder.

"It was really frustrating," Hebert said. "I feel like we should have 30 or 40 points but we couldn't put it in for the touchdown. It was incredible."

The Saints came close to touchdowns twice in the second quarter but were stopped at the Falcons' 13 and 7. Andersen kicked field goals of 31 and 24 yards.

New Orleans had 12 first downs to Atlanta's 2 in the first half and outgained the Falcons 180 yards to 40. The Saints controlled the ball for 23 minutes, 9 seconds.

Sanders was Atlanta's primary offensive weapon in the first half. He caught the first kickoff 6 yards into the end zone and returned it to his own 44, where Andersen drove him out. He also had returns of 27 and 24 yards.

On the final play of the half, Bruce Pickens intercepted Hebert at his own 6 and lateraled to Sanders, who reached the Saints 39 before Hebert tackled him.

"We had trouble with Deion as many do," Saints coach Jim Mora said. "He's an incredible athlete, an awesome athlete. He causes those kinds of problems."

►STULL GIVEN CONTRACT EXTENSION

COLUMBIA, Mo. (AP) — Missouri football coach Bob Stull, 3-8 this season, was given a two-year contract extension through 1995.

Stull's base contract is believed to be $120,000 to $125,000 a year.

Stull has been the Missouri coach for four years. His record as the Tiger coach is 12-31-1, the same record that got predecessor Woody Widenhofer fired.

MU Chancellor Charles Kiesler on Wednesday morning approved the agreement Stull and Missouri athletic director Dan Devine worked out.

Missouri's season-ending victories against K-State and Kansas was cited by Devine as one of the reasons that Stull kept his job after the Tigers got off to a 1-8 start.

Stull holds a bachelor's and master's degrees from K-State, where he was a three-time letterman and captain of the Wildcats in 1967. He was a coaching assistant for the Cats from 1969 to 1970.

►YANKEES WITHDRAW BOND'S OFFER

NEW YORK (AP) — While the Seattle prepared to sign Chris Bosio and Detroit re-signed Alan Trammell, the New York Yankees withdrew their five-year, $35-million offer to Barry Bonds.

Yankees general manager Gene Michael said the offer was pulled back because Bonds's agent, Dennis Gilbert, wanted a sixth year.

The Yankees also made a five-year offer to pitcher Greg Maddux said to be worth more than $30 million.

Bosio and the Mariners were just about done on a four-year contract with an option for 1997, a package said to be worth slightly more than Jose Guzman's $14.35-million deal with the Chicago Cubs.

Trammell returned to the Tigers for $1.5 million with the chance to earn performance bonuses.

In other deals, catcher Steve Lake left Philadelphia to sign with the Chicago Cubs for $275,000, and pitcher Roger Mason left Pittsburgh to sign with the New York Mets for $300,000.

►SOONERS SQUEAK BY OREGON ST.

NORMAN, Okla. (AP) — A poorly-timed behind-the-back pass almost cost the Oklahoma Sooners their season opener.

The errant pass came in the closing seconds of No. 15 Oklahoma's 78-75 win over Oregon State on Thursday.

Leading 75-70 and on a three-on-one break, Angelo Hamilton tried a fancy pass that was intercepted by Brent Barry, who hit a 3-pointer to cut the lead to two.

After Oklahoma made three free throws and Oregon State made two, Barry missed a 3-pointer at the final buzzer, allowing the Sooners (1-0) to escape with the win.

Oklahoma built an 11-point lead with 4 1/2 minutes to play and led by nine with two minutes to go, then got sloppy and had to hang on.

The Sooners made 7 of 8 free throws in the final 42 seconds, including four by Brytt Vann. Oregon State (1-1) made three 3-pointers down the stretch, but couldn't overcome 23 turnovers and foul trouble.

Ag econ junior wins American Royal post, responsible for event promotions

BILL SPIEGEL

Larry Whipple knows what it's like to be a winner.

Whipple, a junior in agricultural economics, was named an ambassador for the American Royal for 1992-93 on Nov. 12.

As an ambassador, he was responsible for promoting the American Royal during the final two weeks of the event this year. Next year, he will again work as a promotions expert for the first week of the American Royal, until the new ambassadors are elected.

He visited with various civic groups and spoke about FFA, the American Royal and the American Royal Student Ambassador Program, he said.

"We visited with different groups of people. We spoke to a second grade class at Pembroke Grade School, as well as meeting with both mayors," he said.

In addition, Whipple and the other ambassador, Christy Dicklich from Capertown, Wyo., were on radio and television shows.

"They treated us well," Whipple said.

To win, he completed an application and wrote a short essay explaining why he would like to participate in the American Royal Student Ambassador Contest.

States sent one male and one female applicant. The candidates were required to be at least 18 years of age and a student in a college or university, as well as a current FFA member.

From all the applications, 16 women and men were selected to come to Kansas City and participate in the final selection process.

The Kansas City Saddle and Siroin Club sponsored the event to interview the 16 finalists.

"The interviews were very relaxed," Whipple said.

After the 20-minute interview, five male and female finalists were selected and interviewed at a banquet.

"They asked us two questions: one serious and one not so serious," Whipple said.

From this process, the two winners were selected.

The winners receive a $5,000 scholarship, broken up into four semesters. Whipple said the sponsors of the event also presented Dicklich and he several prizes.

"They gave us all kinds of gifts," he said.

Mary Kane, Executive Secretary for the Kansas FFA, encouraged Whipple to enter the contest in hopes of winning a scholarship.

"We didn't expect to win the ambassadorship," she said.

Church settles claims in molestation case

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON — Sixty-eight people who claim they were molested as children by a former priest said Thursday they have settled claims against the Roman Catholic diocese, which they had accused of covering up their complaints.

The case reflects a growing openness by the church to confront sexual abuse by clergy, said Roderick MacLeish, the accusers' attorney.

"The days of silence on this problem are over," he said.

The accusers said they were abused in the 1960s by James Porter while he was a priest in the Fall River diocese in southeastern Massachusetts. They said the diocese shifted Porter from parish to parish when complaints against him arose.

Bishop Sean O'Malley said the diocese is drafting policies aimed at speedy review of complaints against priests.

O'Malley said he hoped the settlement would bring comfort and healing to those individuals whose childhoods were shadowed by the acts of a priest of the church.

The accusers agreed to keep financial terms of the settlement secret.

Taxi service gets Topekans home safely

Topeka We Care program combats drunken driving

JENNIFER SHANK
Collegian

Topeka residents have an option for safe holiday driving that Manhattan residents don't.

Topeka We Care is a program that sells coupons to clients or bar owners that think they may utilize the service. Ace Johnson said, vice-president of the Yellow Cab Service.

"Topeka We Care is designed for a mode of safe transportation for those people who are smart enough to know when not to drive," Johnson said.

Topeka We Care prepays the Yellow Cab Service and relies on the purchase of the coupons to break even, Johnson said. A profit is made when coupons are bought and not used.

Johnson said the service was abused in the early stages.

"The client's home address must be printed on the coupon to make sure they are going home," he said. "We are not running a shuttle service from bar to bar."

The program began in October and will last into January, Johnson said.

"It's too bad it can't last longer, because drunk driving is not a concentrated problem," he said. "It is a very good program if it works right."

Johnson said the usage of the Topeka We Care program is fairly good, and he expects it to go up as the holidays get closer.

"Time will tell how effective this program really is," he said.

Manhattan used to have a similar system called Bartenders Against Drunk Drivers (BADD).

Anne Puett, vice-president of Bell Taxi Service in Manhattan, said the BADD Cab was paid for by the City of Manhattan by a fund collected from DUI fines.

She said there were some restrictions in using the taxi service including requiring the patron to go straight home and go more than four blocks.

The taxi service went out of business about three years ago because it got out of control, Puett said.

"College students would want to go all over town since it was free," she said.

Puett said overall it was a good program that kept the streets safe for a while.

"I don't know if the program will be reinstated, but I think it would be a good idea."

Laurie Cammel, Court Services Officer for the City of Manhattan, was a probation officer who supervised the diversions from DUI's that would fund the BADD Cab.

"The BADD Cab was done away with about four years ago because it was being abused by college students in Aggieville," she said.

Facilities shifts gears for wintry weather

Campus lawnmowers equipped with cabs, blades and brooms signal the arrival of winter.

Ed Rice, Division of Facilities vice president, said ground crews have to be adaptable to all seasons.

"We provide maintenance year round, no matter what the climate is," he said.

He said the cold weather forces crews inside, so long-range preparation is done ahead of time.

Rice said maintenance workers couldn't paint exteriors or repair roofs in the winter.

"Icy conditions are the most difficult thing to deal with in the winter since we don't have any equipment to physically remove it," said Jerry Lane, Facilities director of services.

He said the different types of precipitation that arrive in the winter months are the biggest problem.

Snow that falls when the temperature is already well below freezing is the easiest to move, Lane said. It can be moved with the refitted mowers.

"When we have ice, we have to put sand and salt down, and let Mother Nature assist us in the removal," he said.

Lane said the major preparations they make are the equipment adaptations and the stockpiling of sand and salt. Crews also have to blow the water out of the irrigation systems to prevent freeze damage.

The main sidewalks, designated as fire lanes, are the first to be cleared after a snowstorm. The next priority is the other high traffic sidewalks, like those between the residence halls and main campus.

"We try to be very careful of pedestrians when we're out on the sidewalks," he said. "This is primarily a pedestrian campus, and it's just one of those things we have to work around."

Health plan proposed

Insurers unveil program geared toward reform

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — The insurance industry took a big step toward shaping health-care reform Thursday by proposing a sweeping plan for universal coverage that would be financed partly by taxing Americans with generous benefits.

The Health Insurance Association of America, which represents 270 commercial insurers, said the draft proposal approved by its board will jumpstart health-care reform.

A cornerstone of the plan is to cut costs and provide a package of essential benefits to all Americans — including the 35 million currently uninsured. Those are goals championed by President-elect Clinton, who vowed to unveil his own health-care reform plan within his first 100 days in office.

Clinton spokesman George Stephanopoulos said it was a breakthrough for the insurance industry trade group to back a national health-care system.

But the association's proposal reflects insurance-industry thinking long before Clinton's victory, as it became clearer that the nation's $800-billion health-care system was out of control.

Stephanopoulos said the group has a right to try to influence future legislation.

"If there is strong support across the country for national health insurance with real cost

Universal Health Coverage

The Health Insurance Association of America's plan for universal coverage as proposed would include —

■ Private insurers would agree to provide coverage to every American.

■ People would be covered either through their employers or "their own means."

■ Essential-benefits package would pay for catastrophic illness as well as primary and preventive care.

■ Insurers would accept people with pre-existing conditions — everything from heart attacks to AIDS — typically rejected for coverage because they are considered expensive risks.

■ Cost controls would discourage excessive doctor visits as well as unnecessary testing and hospitalizations.

■ Employed Americans who continue to receive generous benefits, anything beyond the value of the essential-benefits package would be taxed as income.

■ Tax revenues would help the government pay for the poor. Private insurers and health providers would give people below the poverty line primary and preventive care.

containment, and that is causing the insurance industry to cooperate with us, we want to work with them," he said.

Some experts contend the United States is a leader in medical technology partly because of insurance companies' tendency to pay for any treatment without regard to cost.

Alan Zimmerman, an analyst with Prudential Securities Inc., said most employer-sponsored health-care plans probably exceed the essential benefits package, making them taxable.

"Are employees going to like this plan?" he asked. "I've never met anyone who likes higher taxes, but everyone has to recognize that if there's a fairness to higher taxes, then it's a tolerable tax."

The insurance industry said the plan also is designed to end an irrational system in which privately insured people are paying for the care of low-income Americans on Medicare and Medicaid.

CAMPUS

K-State speech instructor honored for multicultural efforts

KARREY BRITT

Collegian

A K-State speech instructor will be rewarded for his pursuit of educating students about minorities.

Speech instructor Phil Anderson will receive K-State's 1992 Presidential Award for Distinguished Services to Minority Education for his work in diversity issues and improving understanding and sensitivity.

President Jon Wefald will present Anderson a citation and $1,000 cash at 9 a.m. Dec. 12 in Bramlage Coliseum during commencement. The Conoco-sponsored award is in recognition of excellence in service to minority education at K-State.

"I was absolutely surprised by this award," Anderson said. "It is the nicest award I have received since I have been teaching, and I am deeply gratified."

Anderson's contributions to minority education cover teaching, scholarship, advising, service and making a significant and positive impact not just on minority students but also majority students.

"Human beings seem to focus on the differences," Anderson said. "However, we are more alike than different. Everyone has the same needs. If people work together, we become a more productive society. This is what inspires me to promote equality."

Maribel Landau, senior in economics, said Anderson doesn't necessarily promote diversity but rather harmony and equality among individuals.

"He is a good, caring person who promotes equality, harmony and peace for everyone," Landau said. "He is a friend at many levels."

Anderson said he began integrating material by and about students of color into his classes at least 10 years ago to create awareness of ethnic contributions in the arts, theater and speech classes for all students.

He said he teaches non-theater majors how to operate light and sound equipment. This supports Ebony Theatre and increases the number of minority students qualified in the technical aspects of theater.

As an adviser, Anderson helps students of color with career goals and encourages them to seek out-of-class experiences that will strengthen their backgrounds.

"He always encourages me to be my best and go beyond a level of what I can do," said Vilma Vite, senior in business administration. "He is a very knowledgeable person who helps me from a school level to a personal one."

Anderson has co-chaired the Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week Committee for two years, stimulating the University community to reflect on issues of awareness.

He said his work with the week is his most gratifying opportunity.

"I have learned a lot by working with others because I get a chance to listen and look at other points of view. This goes for my classroom as well," he said.

Anderson received his bachelor's degree in theater, speech and English from St. Cloud State University in Minnesota in 1962. He received a master's of arts in theater directing from Indiana University, Bloomington, in 1966.

He has been a faculty member since 1980.

"If people work together, we become a more productive society. This is what inspires me to promote equality."

Armed aid may be sent to Somalia

Hassan, the charge d'affaires of the Somali U.N. mission. It was not clear which clan leader she represented.

The clans have been battling in Somalia since the collapse of President Mohamed Siad Barre's rule in January 1991, worsening a famine that has killed 300,000 people and put another 2 million at risk.

Well-armed militias, mostly untrained young men and boys, have stolen at least half of the food and medicine shipped to Somalia and paralyzed a 500-member U.N. peacekeeping force since September.

The U.S. military, probably led by Marine Lt. Gen. Bob Johnston, plans to strike quickly. Amphibious craft, attack helicopters and Marines are ready to clear a path for the big air transports and ships that will ferry the hundreds of tractors, trucks and forklifts taking food to the refugee camps.

U.S. officials took pains to portray the intervention as a humanitarian effort, not a combat operation. "We are not looking to go in with guns blazing," said Pentagon spokesman Pete Williams. "I wouldn't expect a big confrontation."

The White House said President Bush hopes the relief operation can be secured by the time he leaves office on Jan. 20. Aides to President-elect Clinton were dubious, however, saying they expected Clinton to inherit Bush's Somalia policy.

A Pentagon official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the first units to arrive will be 1,800 Marines from a force led by the amphibious assault ship USS Tripoli, off East Africa. Next will be up to 16,000 Marines from the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force from Camp Pendleton, Calif., and then about 10,000 soldiers from the Army's light infantry 10th Mountain Division at Fort Drum, N.Y., the source said.

About 560 U.S. troops already are working in Somalia and Kenya, using 10 C-130 transport planes in the U.S. military's "Provide Relief" mission.

Homes mark holiday season

Festive benefit for McCain Performance Series sets $5,000 goal

KIM MCNITT
Collegian

While people still may be recovering from the Thanksgiving holiday, some Manhattan residents have decorated their homes for Christmas, ready for all to see.

The Friends of McCain Board of Directors is sponsoring the Holiday Home Tour '92 from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. Saturday.

Proceeds will help sponsor the McCain Performance Series.

This year's fund-raising goal is $5,000.

The last tour was during the Persian Gulf War, and profits cleared $4,500.

There are 135 community volunteers involved in the event, and about 500 visitors are expected to attend.

Tickets allow the tourists to make five stops during the day, and there is no set progression. The McCain Student Development Council members will serve as guides in the homes, event chairwoman Sue Shultz said.

The Alpha Delta Pi sorority house, 518 Sunset Ave., will be the hospitality house for the day.

Refreshments will be available, and sorority members will be showing their own "home away from home."

"Our whole house has been involved. We've all been decorating," said Jennifer Smith, junior in English and pre-law and ADPI house manager.

"It's a great privilege. We're really excited."

The Cash house, 1831 Poyntz Ave., is better known as "Pickets on Poyntz" because of its traditional, white picket fence.

The Cape Cod residence was built in 1933, but the fence was not added until 1983.

Highlights will include hundreds of miniature lights, yards of garland and evergreen hearts.

The Kaup house, 2325 Grandview Terrace, is a modern home featuring details such as birch woodwork and cabinets, built-in cornices, unusual curved soffits and recessed lighting.

The entire south side opens to the garden. It was constructed in 1956 and restored in 1991.

The Tolley house, 200 N. 16th St., is a Dutch Colonial home built in 1927.

The home displays Victorian dolls and keepsakes.

HOLIDAY HOME TOUR '92

The tour of five Manhattan homes will be from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. Saturday. Tickets are $10 in advance at the McCain Auditorium ticket office and $12 at the door. The hospitality house, which will serve refreshments, will be the Alpha Delta Pi sorority house, 518 Sunset Ave.

The Van Meter home, 1411 Sheringbrook Drive, is an example of Victorian country living.

It includes a two-story foyer, formal stairway and gazebo.

Three Christmas trees each have their own special identity — a family ornament tree, a Santa tree and a formal Victorian tree.

"We've had fun doing things to the house that we've always said we'd do," homeowner Susan Tolley said.

Floral arrangements in the houses have been provided by Blooming Dale's Garden Center, Steve's Floral, Westloop Floral, Trisha Cash and Manhattan Floral Company.

The price may be considered a donation to McCain Auditorium.

First readings of new bills dominate Senate meeting

Porter said. "I think it's worth it."

Senate also heard first reading on proposed changes in SGA by-laws. It would have to pass by a two-thirds vote and be approved by the college councils.

A report from student tribunal delayed action on the Bramlage Fee Continuance for at least another week. According to tribunal interpretation, senators have only one week to reconsider bills.

The Bramlage fee was initially rejected by Senate at the Nov. 20 meeting but brought right back for reconsideration. However, due to tribunal's interpretation of the constitution, Senate would not have the right to reconsider at this date.

Sen. Joel Gruenke moved, and Senate passed, a request that tribunal prepare a more detailed report on its ability to reconsider bills. After hearing next week's report, a decision will be made.

A bill proposing a fee increase for KSDB-FM 91.9 also received first reading. Other first readings included a bill to revise the way SGA allocates funds to campus organizations and the addition of an Academic Career Information Center to benefit students who are undeclared, change majors or are academically displaced.

Why is it we're always the last to know?

Here we were, sitting around the office, quite content and secure in the knowledge that God was in his heaven and all was right with the world.

And then the letter arrived. It was from Capitol Records, writing to inform us that the ninth Duran Duran effort, "The Wedding Album," is coming out in February, after singer Simon LeBon recuperates from a motorcycle racing accident — suffered LAST JULY!

Needless to say, flowers were sent and vicious phone calls made to try to figure out how we were left out of the information chain. Imagine, us sitting around being smug while LeBon lay in a hospital bed with a broken wrist, collarbone and tire treads on his backside.

The guys in the Capitol publicity department get points off for the delay, and also for using the horrific word "savvy" in their press release.

Of Human Binding ... and bondage also

Two Austin, Tex., public libraries have put their foot down on Madonna's latest Dickensian effort, "Sex."

They've had it up to here, they've said. No more, they've vowed.

It's time to strike a blow for good book-binding craftsmanship, they've threatened.

Yup, apparently the reason that this Great American Navel book was yanked was because the tomes' spiral bindings couldn't take the heavy handling.

"The books were absolutely falling apart," said the city's library director, of the book which depicts Ms. Ciccone pumping gas in the nude, hitchhiking in nothing but heels, and playing around with leather items that look nothing like what you made at summer camp.

"Spirals don't usually hold up. But when you have 40 people a day looking at it, that's pretty heavy use."

This sounds like something that would occur in the stacks at Farrell.

The real reason why Florida property values are plummeting

The Giroux family of Jacksonville, Fla., has an illness.

They've collected more than 4,000 Disney items including stuffed animals, clothing, figurines, toothbrushes, towels, shower curtains, cuff links, and coffee mugs.

They drive to Disney World, 140 miles away, 40 to 50 times a year.

They've nicknamed their 1-year-old daughter "Cinderella." She visited Disney World for the first time at the tender age of 3 days, and now she's teething on Minnie Mouse's rubber ears.

And how does Mr. Giroux react to this shrine of sorts?

"I don't know what it's worth. You pick up a couple of things, and all of a sudden, it became an obsession almost," he said.

What do you mean, "almost"?

Speaking of blessed smelters, gunners and angry dead novelists

Attention all gunners, miners, mathematicians, architects, smelters (smelters?), brewers, oilers and masons. Today marks the Feast of St. Barbara, your appointed patron saint.

While we're on the subject, it's also the Feast of St. Peter Chrysologus, National Day in lovely Burma, and the anniversary of the election of Nicholas Breakspear, the only Englishman ever to be elected Pope (Adrian IV) in 1154.

If it wasn't for the fact that he's been dead for 190 years, we'd send a chirpy singing telegram to English novelist Samuel Butler.

Born on Dec. 4, 1835, Butler made a literary name for himself by writing scathing novels that had a lot of fun tearing the apart the conventions of the Victorian Period.

Butler's two greatest works are "Erewhon," a satirical look at English society (notice the title is an anagram of "nowhere." Clever, eh?) and "The Way of All Flesh," a semiautobiographical work that focused on the rigid parental domination that characterized the age.

EXPLORING SEATON HALL'S SUBCULTURE

For some strange reason, walking through a certain campus building calls up vivid recollections of Willy Wonka's chocolate factory.

Both places are about 10 times larger on the inside than they appear to be from the outside.

Both places contain a tight-knit community in which outside intrusions are not encouraged.

And when you walk by the stone and ivy edifice, you can see people diligently working away inside.

But these aren't Oompa-Loompas, and this place has nothing to do with Charlie Bucket's golden ticket.

This is Seaton Hall.

Populated by students of the College of Architecture and Design, Seaton is known primarily as a place where these students take part in the compelling, and often grueling, ritual known as "studio."

Projects, the academic reason for all this studio-time investment, are very dear, and some students go to great lengths to preserve them.

"A guy last year cut open his finger with an X-acto knife, and he hot-glued the wound shut so that he wouldn't bleed on his project," Terry Newell, senior in architecture, said. "He just kept on working."

Animal life also thrives in this mid-campus reservation.

"Sparrows have been in here. Mice, roaches, too," said Jennie Kunsch, senior in architecture. "There was a bat in here one time, about the size of a softball. It stayed on the wall for a day or two."

A story was told of one unfortunate student, Brad Sonner, senior in landscape architecture, who seems to be attacked by large skunks the moment he emerges from the studio after a late night.

"He comes in here every week with a different skunk story. Skunks follow him. Big skunks just jump out at him," said Kim Cuddeback, senior in landscape architecture.

"Eventually, he just starts pulling all-nighters just to escape the skunks," added Craig Hahn, senior in landscape architecture.

Like the Greek nation-states of old, different studios are spatially separated by only a few feet, but the personality differences may be vast from room to room as they assume different traits and reputations.

"Each department will have their own idiosyncracies. Some rooms are just anal," said Mark Connelley, senior in landscape architecture. "It's all in good fun."

Working diligently on their architecture designs, Shannon Niemann and Matt Pemberton, freshmen in environmental design, spend Wednesday evening in their studio classroom. Many architecture students work late into the night.

"You can definitely tell a difference between the rooms," said Bruce Rau, senior in landscape architecture. "This one is loud and obnoxious, others are quiet, and we got a lot of country music in one room."

Sports take a different twist.

"We take creative study breaks. When it's nice outside, we'll fly a kite. We throw paper airplanes — some even make it to Ahearn," Connelley said. "Everyone looks at us funny, but who cares?"

And there was the drinking.

The legend tells of a time a few years back when some studio dwellers, forced to work over spring break, managed to sneak a keg into the building.

"Someone, I don't remember who, told us the campus cops were on their way over. They put the keg into a hole in the wall and covered the tap with a coat," Kunsch said.

"They came in and searched all over because they knew they had been drinking, but they never found anything. That was two years ago, though."

Studio veterans immediately know when someone who doesn't belong comes in the room.

"Someone walks in, and you immediately know they don't belong. We all know everyone else up here," Connelley said.

"We know everyone in the major, and everyone older than us," Kunsch said. "We know everyone, and we know who doesn't belong."

Words and phrases develop, probably due to the time studio requires of students.

"Girlfriends, wives, they bring us food, keep us in contact with the outside world," Connelley said. "We call them 'studio widows.' 'Hey, honey, there was a presidential election the other day.'"

"Third-year students are called nubs. That's always the way it's been, and I can't tell you why," he said.

Like a community of worker bees, everything is done for the good of the hive of Seaton.

"Sometimes we sleep in here, just to make sure we all go to class," Newell said.

Each station has a phone list so they may keep tabs on the others for this purpose.

While this close kindred may seem a bit stifling, it also harks back to a vision many have of the ideal college environment. A place where everyone knows each other and looks out for each other, where all share the torture called studio.

Seaton's image from the outside resembles nothing on the inside. Just like its students, there's more than meets the eye.

Twisting the Queen's English with weird, hilarious results

Translators cull strangest of grammar flubs for public display

ASSOCIATED PRESS

BRUSSELS, Belgium — It's enough to make a grammarian groan.

The European Community — no stranger to tortured language itself — has collected some of the worst abuses of the Queen's English from around the world.

Take the Paris hotel that told guests:

"Please leave your values at the desk."

Or the Bangkok dry cleaner's boast:

"Drop your trousers here for best results."

And what did an Austrian ski resort mean when it urged guests "not to preambulate the corridors in the hours of repose in the boots of ascension"?

Dozens of such doozies have been compiled by traveling EC translators since July, when they were asked to look out for examples of odd English. Others were taken from published collections.

Under the title "Mind Your Language," the fractured phrases are displayed on boards in the lobbies of the EC's Centre Borschette office complex.

The compilation of linguistic lusus show English is spoken widely but not always well.

An Acapulco hotel, for instance, reassured guests about the drinking water: "The manager has personally passed all the water served here."

A Tokyo hotel advised guests it "is forbidden to steal hotel towels please." But politely added, "If you are not a person to do such thing please not to read notice."

Another Tokyo hotel, seemingly more relaxed about morals, said: "You are invited to take advantage of the chambermaid."

A notice in a Norwegian cocktail lounge stated: "Ladies are requested not to have children in the bar."

A Rome doctor specialized in "women and other diseases," and a Swedish furrier offered coats "made for ladies from their own skin."

In Tokyo, a car rental agency offered these instructions to clients:

"When passenger of foot heave into sight, tootle the horn. Trumpet him melodiously at first, but if he still obstacles your passage then tootle him with vigor."

For people suffering toothache in Hong Kong, a dentist advertised tooth extractions "using the latest Methodists."

And a tailor on the Greek island of Rhodes couldn't guarantee he could finish summer suits ordered by tourists. Why? "Because is big rush we will execute customers in strict rotation."

K-State working on compliance

for next year is to provide access for disabled people, like sidewalks and elevators," Rawson said.

Taussig said the new ADA requirements will not propose that much of a change because K-State was already complying with the Rehabilitation Act of 1974, which also had many requirements for disabled accessibility.

Rice said the act mainly changes the facilities division's awareness of student's problems.

"It raised the awareness, and now we're working closer with people who need specific considerations," Rice said.

Handicapped parking stalls are one item covered by the ADA.

The surveying committee found that K-State has more than the required number of handicapped parking spaces, Taussig said. The ADA set a ratio of handicapped spaces needed to the total number of stalls.

"We have more than the ADA requires. The question is, are they in the right locations? We'll be continuing to evaluate that," Taussig said.

"Another thing is that the handicapped stalls we do have might not have the right widths. The requirements want a van width, which is 16 feet wide. Most of our stalls are eight feet."

The act is not limited to mobility-disabled people. Hearing- or vision-impaired individuals also require special campus accommodations.

Rice said the University is putting up braille signs for the blind students, and sign-language interpretation is also available.

He said not all campus buildings have elevators because of the expense, which is around $60,000 for a new one. In a case of a conflict, room scheduling can be altered.

"We will be conforming to all ADA, but not all our facilities will be accessible — it is not required. With the cost being $60,000 for a new elevator, isn't it justifiable to have the meeting somewhere else?" Rice said.

Howard Markley, graduate assistant at disabled student services, said 56 disabled students have contacted the office, but that is only one-third of the disabled students on campus.

Markley agreed most buildings on campus have wheelchair accessibility. But if a student has a problem with class location, he said, the office will try to change the location.

Steve Compton, senior in agriculture business, uses a wheelchair and said he rarely has a problem with accessibility on campus. Disabled student services handles his classroom changes when necessary, he said.

"Whenever I enroll, my enrollment sheet goes through the disabled student services office, and she makes the changes there. Then, when I come back, all the classes have been moved," Compton said.

He said he has seen a lot of improvement from when he started at K-State.

"When I first came up here, it was all right. But since then, I've seen changes to try to comply. There are a lot more power doors, curb cuts and elevators," he said.

Rice said it is an ideal for the future to have all the buildings up to code, but he said fund restrictions make this difficult.

"There is not enough money in the state of Kansas to get every building up to code," Rice said. "There is a lot to accomplish. It is an eventual goal that we'll never achieve."

drive. The food will be distributed through the Flint Hills Breadbasket. The Breadbasket will also coordinate food distribution with several local pantries.

While Seidler praised the amount of food that has already been collected, he encouraged people to continue the current pace and exceed the goal.

Breadbasket director Shirley

Bramhall encouraged people to think about those who are hungry in the holiday season.

She guided the crowd on an imaginary tour of homes, but instead of large, beautiful homes, she told people to imagine needy homes.

"This time of year really warms your heart," Bramhall said.

"Hunger is a year-round issue that doesn't go away with the holiday."

K-State Hospitality Management Society members served cookies, hot cider and cocoa at the event.

"This is the third year we've been involved in the tree-lighting, and I think our members get a lot out of it," said Traci Horton, society president and senior in hotel and restaurant management.

"It's really heartening to see the community come to support those who don't have much."

Naturalization Service or the National Council of La Raza, a group which lobbies for Latino issues.

Bautista said he is considering graduate schools at the University of Texas at Austin, the University of Arizona and the University of New Mexico.

"I'm looking for a Latin American studies program that would allow me to focus on border issues," he said.

Walters said finalists for the scholarship will be announced in late January. After a final interview process, winners will be announced in April.

Truman scholarships are awarded to up to 79 American students each year. The scholarship is intended to help students prepare for careers in the government, with an emphasis on potential leadership ability.

The scholarship fund was set up by Congress in honor of Harry Truman, the 33rd U.S. president.

Students must be nominated by the University in order to apply for the scholarship.

NEWS AND MORE

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Reader offers advice to K.C. and the Liberated Woman

DEAR CASSANDRA,

I am glad you put both K.C. and the Liberated Woman in their place in your last column, but I feel you did an inadequate job in your rebuttal to K.C.

I would reply that there are plenty of women who would love nothing better than to have him bring home the bacon while they cook it up and take care of the kids, do wifely things, etc. Go find one of them, live a happy life and quit flapping your trap about how all women should be. Heck, my wife works, makes more than me, and I love it. My ego can handle it, and money is money.

To the Liberated Woman: Lady, the only thing you have been liberated from is the good sense to keep your mouth shut. Like you did in your letter, I will make a few sweeping generalizations that you undoubtedly will disagree with.

First, most women who are mistreated by men bring this behavior upon themselves because they tolerate it. You don't know how many women I have seen in my life stick with a guy who cheats on them and treats them like dirt. Why they do this, I don't know. Perhaps the daily roller-coaster ride of a woman's emotional state cannot handle the task of telling her beloved to hit the road. Regardless of the reason, if women would just be less tolerant of no-good men, I assure you these guys would shape up.

As for the "momma" remark, you are totally off base. Many guys that I know can cook and clean up after themselves and have no need for a momma. Maybe all women want in a man is a daddy, someone to provide the good things in life, and always agree and support them no matter what.

As for not living up to the marriage partnership, I don't know what you're talking about. I am sure there are just as many bad wives as there are bad husbands.

In closing, I would just like to say it would be pure bliss if we lived in a world of perfect relationships, but since we don't, let's look at the situation fairly and not blame one gender unfairly for all of the problems.

I've got to go now; my wife gets off from work soon, and I want to have a good dinner waiting for her, and, God forbid, I might even do the dishes!

Just a Normal Guy

DEAR NORMAL GUY,

While I agree with most of what you say, I must point out a glaring error in your comments on battered women. Physical abuse of women by men is not a response by men to something women are doing incorrectly.

Just because a woman lacks the courage or the means to report physical abuse does not mean she deserves the abuse she gets or deserves further abuse. Many, many women who are abused do not have the education and/or the financial means to support themselves apart from their husbands, let alone the emotional stability and self-confidence required to do so.

In most cases, they are being asked to make the additional choice of either abandoning children to leave their husband or take the children with them, which only increases the burden of supporting herself apart from her husband. It has absolutely nothing to do with a woman's "emotional state," whatever that may be.

You correctly suggest they should not tolerate it, but in most cases, they rarely have a viable choice. As a civilized society, we must find a means of offering them the support they need to make that choice, while we simultaneously teach our young men that violence is not the answer to life's problems.
